Great Britain as a South American State is to be entirely differentiated from Great Britain generally, and if the boundary question can not be settled otherwise than by force, British Guiana, with her own independent resources, and not those of the British Empire, should be left to settle the matter with Venezuela—an arrangement which very possibly Venezuela might not object to. But the proposition that an European power with an American dependency is, for the purposes of the Monroe doctrine, to be classed not as an European but as an American State will not admit of serious discussion. If it were to be adopted, the Monroe doctrine would be too valueless to be worth asserting. Not only would every European power now having a South American colony be enabled to extend its possessions on this continent indefinitely, but any other European power might also do the same by first taking pains to procure a fraction of South American soil by voluntary cession.

The declaration of the Monroe message—that existing colonies or dependencies of an European power would not be interfered with by the United States—means colonies or dependencies then existing, with their limits as then existing. So it has been invariably construed, and so it must continue to be construed unless it is to be deprived of all vital force. Great Britain can not be deemed a South American State within the purview of the Monroe doctrine, nor, if she is appropriating Venezuelan territory, is it material that she does so by advancing the frontier of an old colony instead of by the planting of a new colony. The difference is matter of form and not of substance, and the doctrine, if pertinent in the one case, must be in the other also. It is not admitted, however, and therefore can not be assumed, that Great Britain is in fact usurping dominion over Venezuelan territory. While Venezuela charges such usurpation, Great Britain denies it, and the United States, until the merits are authoritatively ascertained, can take sides with neither. But while this is so—while the United States may not, under existing circumstances at least, take upon itself to say which of the two parties is right and which wrong—it is certainly within its right to demand that the truth shall be ascertained. Being entitled to resent and resist any sequestration of Venezuelan soil by Great Britain, it is necessarily entitled to know whether such sequestration has occurred or is now going on. Otherwise, if the United States is without the right to know and have it determined whether there is or is not British aggression upon Venezuelan territory, its right to protest against or repel such aggression may be dismissed from consideration.

The right to act upon a fact the existence of which there is no right to have ascertained is simply illusory. It being clear, therefore, that the United States may legitimately insist upon the merits of the boundary question being determined, it is equally clear that there is but one feasible mode of determining them, viz, peaceful arbitration. The impracticability of any conventional adjustment has been often and thoroughly demonstrated. Even more impossible of consideration is an appeal to arms—a mode of settling national pretensions unhappily not yet wholly obsolete. If, however, it were not condemnable as a relic of barbarism and a crime in itself, so one-sided a contest could not be invited nor even accepted by Great Britain without distinct disparagement to her character as a civilized State. Great Britain, however, assumes no such attitude. On the contrary, she both admits that there is a controversy and that arbitration should be resorted to for its adjustment. But, while up to that point her attitude leaves nothing to be desired, its practical effect is completely nullified by her insistence that the submission shall cover but a part of the controversy—that, as a condition of arbitrating her right to a part of the disputed territory, the remainder shall be turned over to her. If it were possible to point to a boundary which both parties had ever agreed or assumed to be such either expressly or tacitly, the demand that territory conceded by such line to British Guiana should be held not to be in dispute might rest upon a reasonable basis. But there is no such line. The territory which Great Britain insists shall be ceded to her as a condition of arbitrating her claim to other territory has never been admitted to belong to her. It has always and consistently been claimed by Venezuela.

Upon what principle—except her feebleness as a nation—is she to be denied the right of having the claim heard and passed upon by an impartial tribunal? No reason nor shadow of reason appears in all the voluminous literature of the subject. "It is to be so because I will it to be so" seems to be the only justification Great Britain offers. It is, indeed, intimated that the British claim to this particular territory rests upon an occupation which, whether acquiesced in or not, has ripened into a perfect title by long continuance. But what prescription affecting territorial rights can be said to exist as between sovereign States? Or, if there is any, what is the legitimate consequence? It is not that all arbitration should be denied, but only that the submission should embrace an additional topic, namely, the validity of the asserted prescriptive title either in point of law or in point of fact. No different result follows from the contention that as matter of principle Great Britain can not be asked to submit and ought not to submit to arbitration her political and sovereign rights over territory. This contention, if applied to the whole or to a vital part of the possessions of a sovereign State, need not be controverted. To hold otherwise might be equivalent to holding that a sovereign State was bound to arbitrate its very existence.

But Great Britain has herself shown in various instances that the principle has no pertinency when either the interests or the territorial area involved are not of controlling magnitude and her loss of them as the result of an arbitration can not appreciably affect her honor or her power. Thus, she has arbitrated the extent of her colonial possessions twice with the United States, twice with Portugal, and once with Germany, and perhaps in other instances. The northwest water boundary arbitration of 1872 between her and this country is an example in point and well illustrates both the effect to be given to long-continued use and enjoyment and the fact that a truly great power sacrifices neither prestige nor dignity by reconsidering the most emphatic rejection of a proposition, when satisfied of the obvious and intrinsic justice of the case. By the award of the Emperor of Germany, the arbitrator in that case, the United States acquired San Juan and a number of smaller islands near the coast of Vancouver as a consequence of the decision that the term "the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island," as used in the treaty of Washington of 1846, meant the Haro channel and not the Rosario channel. Yet a leading contention of Great Britain before the arbitrator was that equity required a judgment in her favor because a decision in favor of the United States would deprive British subjects of rights of navigation of which they had had the habitual enjoyment from the time when the Rosario Strait was first explored and surveyed in 1798. So, though by virtue of the award the United States acquired San Juan and the other islands of the group to which it belongs, the British foreign secretary had in 1859 instructed the British minister at Washington as follows:

"Her Majesty's Government must, therefore, under any circumstances, maintain the right of the British Crown to the Island of San Juan. The interests at stake in connection with the retention of that island are too important to admit of compromise, and your lordship will consequently bear in mind that, whatever arrangement as to the boundary line is finally arrived at, no settlement of the question will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government which does not provide for the Island of San Juan being reserved to the British Crown."

Thus, as already intimated, the British demand that her right to a portion of the disputed territory shall be acknowledged before she will consent to an arbitration as to the rest seems to stand upon nothing but her own ipse dixit. She says to Venezuela, in substance: "You can get none of the debatable land by force, because you are not strong enough; you can get none by treaty, because I will not agree; and you can take your chance of getting a portion by arbitration only if you first agree to abandon to me such other portion as I may designate." It is not perceived how such an attitude can be defended nor how it is reconcilable with that love of justice and fair play so eminently characteristic of the English race. It in effect deprives Venezuela of her free agency and puts her under virtual duress. Territory acquired by reason of it will be as much wrested from her by the strong hand as if occupied by British troops or covered by British fleets. It seems, therefore, quite impossible that this position of Great Britain should be assented to by the United States, or that, if such position be adhered to with the result of enlarging the bounds of British Guiana, it should not be regarded as amounting, in substance, to an invasion and conquest of Venezuelan territory.

In these circumstances the duty of the President appears to him unmistakable and imperative. Great Britain's assertion of title to the disputed territory, combined with her refusal to have that title investigated, being a substantial appropriation of the territory to her own use, not to protest and give warning that the transaction will be regarded as injurious to the interests of the people of the United States, as well as oppressive in itself, would be to ignore an established policy with which the honor and welfare of this country are closely identified. While the measures necessary or proper for the vindication of that policy are to be determined by another branch of the Government, it is clearly for the Executive to leave nothing undone which may tend to render such determination unnecessary.

You are instructed, therefore, to present the foregoing views to Lord Salisbury by reading to him this communication (leaving with him a copy should he so desire), and to reenforce them by such pertinent considerations as will doubtless occur to you. They call for a definite decision upon the point whether Great Britain will consent or will decline to submit the Venezuelan boundary question in its entirety to impartial arbitration. It is the earnest hope of the President that the conclusion will be on the side of arbitration, and that Great Britain will add one more to the conspicuous precedents she has already furnished in favor of that wise and just mode of adjusting international disputes. If he is to be disappointed in that hope, however—a result not to be anticipated and in his judgment calculated to greatly embarrass the future relations between this country and Great Britain—it is his wish to be made acquainted with the fact at such early date as will enable him to lay the whole subject before Congress in his next annual message.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD OLNEY.

MR. ADEE TO MR. BAYARD.

No. 806.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 24, 1895.

SIR: In Mr. Olney's instruction No. 804, of the 20th instant, in relation to the Anglo-Venezuelan boundary dispute, you will note a reference to the sudden increase of the area claimed for British Guiana, amounting to 33,000 square miles, between 1884 and 1886. This statement is made on the authority of the British publication entitled the Statesman's Year Book.

I add for your better information that the same statement is found in the British Colonial Office List, a Government publication.

In the issue for 1885 the following passage occurs, on page 24, under the head of British Guiana:

"It is impossible to specify the exact area of the colony, as its precise boundaries between Venezuela and Brazil, respectively, are undetermined, but it has been computed to be 76,000 square miles."

In the issue of the same list for 1886 the same statement occurs, on page 33, with the change of area to "about 109,000 square miles."

The official maps in the two volumes mentioned are identical, so that the increase of 33,000 square miles claimed for British Guiana is not thereby explained, but later Colonial Office List maps show a varying sweep of the boundary westward into what previously figured as Venezuelan territory, while no change is noted on the Brazilian frontier.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

ALVEY A. ADEE, Acting Secretary.

LORD SALISBURY TO SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

No. 189.] FOREIGN OFFICE, November 26, 1895.

SIR: On the 7th of August I transmitted to Lord Gough a copy of the dispatch from Mr. Olney which Mr. Bayard had left with me that day, and of which he had read portions to me. I informed him at the time that it could not be answered until it had been carefully considered by the law officers of the Crown. I have therefore deferred replying to it till after the recess.

I will not now deal with those portions of it which are concerned exclusively with the controversy that has for some time past existed between the Republic of Venezuela and Her Majesty's Government in regard to the boundary which separates their dominions. I take a very different view from Mr. Olney of various matters upon which he touches in that part of the dispatch; but I will defer for the present all observations upon it, as it concerns matters which are not in themselves of first-rate importance, and do not directly concern the relations between Great Britain and the United States.

The latter part, however, of the dispatch, turning from the question of the frontiers of Venezuela, proceeds to deal with principles of a far wider character, and to advance doctrines of international law which are of considerable interest to all the nations whose dominions include any portion of the Western Hemisphere.

The contentions set forth by Mr. Olney in this part of his dispatch are represented by him as being an application of the political maxims which are well known in American discussion under the name of the Monroe doctrine. As far as I am aware, this doctrine has never been before advanced on behalf of the United States in any written communication addressed to the Government of another nation; but it has been generally adopted and assumed as true by many eminent writers and politicians in the United States. It is said to have largely influenced the Government of that country in the conduct of its foreign affairs; though Mr. Clayton, who was Secretary of State under President Taylor, expressly stated that that Administration had in no way adopted it. But during the period that has elapsed since the message of President Monroe was delivered in 1823 the doctrine has undergone a very notable development, and the aspect which it now presents in the hands of Mr. Olney differs widely from its character when it first issued from the pen of its author. The two propositions which in effect President Monroe laid down were, first, that America was no longer to be looked upon as a field for European colonization; and, secondly, that Europe must not attempt to extend its political system to America, or to control the political condition of any of the American communities who had recently declared their independence.

The dangers against which President Monroe thought it right to guard were not as imaginary as they would seem at the present day. The formation of the Holy Alliance; the congresses of Laybach and Verona; the invasion of Spain by France for the purpose of forcing upon the Spanish people a form of government which seemed likely to disappear, unless it was sustained by external aid, were incidents fresh in the mind of President Monroe when he penned his celebrated message. The system of which he speaks, and of which he so resolutely deprecates the application to the American Continent, was the system then adopted by certain powerful States upon the Continent of Europe of combining to prevent by force of arms the adoption in other countries of political institutions which they disliked, and to uphold by external pressure those which they approved. Various portions of South America had recently declared their independence, and that independence had not been recognized by the Governments of Spain and Portugal, to which, with small exception, the whole of Central and South America were nominally subject. It was not an imaginary danger that he foresaw, if he feared that the same spirit which had dictated the French expedition into Spain might inspire the more powerful Governments of Europe with the idea of imposing, by the force of European arms, upon the South American communities the form of government and the political connection which they had thrown off. In declaring that the United States would resist any such enterprise if it was contemplated, President Monroe adopted a policy which received the entire sympathy of the English Government of that date.

The dangers which were apprehended by President Monroe have no relation to the state of things in which we live at the present day. There is no danger of any Holy Alliance imposing its system upon any portion of the American Continent, and there is no danger of any European State treating any part of the American Continent as a fit object for European colonization. It is intelligible that Mr. Olney should invoke, in defense of the views on which he is now insisting, an authority which enjoys so high a popularity with his own fellow-countrymen. But the circumstances with which President Monroe was dealing, and those to which the present American Government is addressing itself, have very few features in common. Great Britain is imposing no "system" upon Venezuela, and is not concerning herself in any way with the nature of the political institutions under which the Venezuelans may prefer to live. But the British Empire and the Republic of Venezuela are neighbors, and they have differed for some time past, and continue to differ, as to the line by which the dominions are separated. It is a controversy with which the United States have no apparent practical concern. It is difficult, indeed, to see how it can materially affect any State or community outside those primarily interested, except perhaps other parts of Her Majesty's dominions, such as Trinidad. The disputed frontier of Venezuela has nothing to do with any of the questions dealt with by President Monroe. It is not a question of the colonization by a European power of any portion of America. It is not a question of the imposition upon the communities of South America of any system of government devised in Europe. It is simply the determination of the frontier of a British possession which belonged to the Throne of England long before the Republic of Venezuela came into existence. But even if the interests of Venezuela were so far linked to those of the United States as to give to the latter a locus standi in this controversy, their Government apparently have not formed, and certainly do not express, any opinion upon the actual merits of the dispute.

The Government of the United States do not say that Great Britain, or that Venezuela, is in the right in the matters that are in issue. But they lay down that the doctrine of President Monroe, when he opposed the imposition of European systems, or the renewal of European colonization, confers upon them the right of demanding that when a European power has a frontier difference with a South American community the European power shall consent to refer that controversy to arbitration; and Mr. Olney states that unless Her Majesty's Government accede to this demand it will "greatly embarrass the future relations between Great Britain and the United States."

Whatever may be the authority of the doctrine laid down by President Monroe, there is nothing in his language to show that he ever thought of claiming this novel prerogative for the United States. It is admitted that he did not seek to assert a protectorate over Mexico or the States of Central and South America. Such a claim would have imposed upon the United States the duty of answering for the conduct of these States, and consequently the responsibility of controlling it. His sagacious foresight would have led him energetically to deprecate the addition of so serious a burden to those which the rulers of the United States have to bear. It follows of necessity that if the Government of the United States will not control the conduct of these communities neither can it undertake to protect them from the consequences attaching to any misconduct of which they may be guilty toward other nations. If they violate in any way the rights of another State, or of its subjects, it is not alleged that the Monroe doctrine will assure them the assistance of the United States in escaping from any reparation which they may be bound by international law to give. Mr. Olney expressly disclaims such an inference from the principles he lays down.

But the claim which he founds upon them is that if any independent American State advances a demand for territory of which its neighbor claims to be the owner, and that neighbor is the colony of a European State, the United States have a right to insist that the European State shall submit the demand and its own impugned rights to arbitration.

I will not now enter into a discussion of the merits of this method of terminating international differences. It has proved itself valuable in many cases; but it is not free from defects, which often operate as a serious drawback on its value. It is not always easy to find an arbitrator who is competent and who, at the same time, is wholly free from bias; and the task of insuring compliance with the award when it is made not exempt from difficulty. It is a mode of settlement of which the value varies much according to the nature of the controversy to which it is applied and the character of the litigants who appeal to it. Whether, in any particular case, it is a suitable method of procedure is generally a delicate and difficult question. The only parties who are competent to decide that question are the two parties whose rival contentions are in issue. The claim of a third nation, which is unaffected by the controversy, to impose this particular procedure on either of the two others can not be reasonably justified, and has no foundation in the law of nations.

In the remarks which I have made, I have argued on the theory that the Monroe doctrine in itself is sound. I must not, however, be understood as expressing any acceptance of it on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It must always be mentioned with respect, on account of the distinguished statesman to whom it is due and the great nation who have generally adopted it. But international law is founded on the general consent of nations; and no statesman, however eminent, and no nation, however powerful, are competent to insert into the code of international law a novel principle which was never recognized before and which has not since been accepted by the Government of any other country. The United States have a right, like any other nation, to interpose in any controversy by which their own interests are affected; and they are the judge whether those interests are touched, and in what measure they should be sustained. But their rights are in no way strengthened or extended by the fact that the controversy affects some territory which is called American. Mr. Olney quotes the case of the recent Chilean war, in which the United States declined to join with France and England in an effort to bring hostilities to a close, on account of the Monroe doctrine. The United States were entirely in their right in declining to join in an attempt at pacification if they thought fit; but Mr. Olney's principle that "American questions are for American decision," even if it receive any countenance from the language of President Monroe (which it does not), can not be sustained by any reasoning drawn from the law of nations.

The Government of the United States is not entitled to affirm as a universal proposition, with reference to a number of independent States for whose conduct it assumes no responsibility, that its interests are necessarily concerned in whatever may befall those States simply because they are situated in the Western Hemisphere. It may well be that the interests of the United States are affected by something that happens to Chile or to Peru, and that that circumstance may give them the right of interference; but such a contingency may equally happen in the case of China or Japan, and the right of interference is not more extensive or more assured in the one case than in the other.

Though the language of President Monroe is directed to the attainment of objects which most Englishmen would agree to be salutary, it is impossible to admit that they have been inscribed by any adequate authority in the code of international law; and the danger which such admission would involve is sufficiently exhibited both by the strange development which the doctrine has received at Mr. Olney's hands and the arguments by which it is supported in the dispatch under reply. In defense of it he says:

"That distance and 3,000 miles of intervening ocean make any permanent political union between a European and an American State unnatural and inexpedient will hardly be denied. But physicial and geographical considerations are the least of the objections to such a union. Europe has a set of primary interests which are peculiar to herself; America is not interested in them, and ought not to be vexed or complicated with them."

And, again:

"Thus far in our history we have been spared the burdens and evils of immense standing armies and all the other accessories of huge warlike establishments; and the exemption has highly contributed to our national greatness and wealth, as well as to the happiness of every citizen. But with the powers of Europe permanently encamped on American soil, the ideal conditions we have thus far enjoyed can not be expected to continue."

The necessary meaning of these words is that the union between Great Britain and Canada; between Great Britain and Jamaica and Trinidad; between Great Britain and British Honduras or British Guiana are "inexpedient and unnatural." President Monroe disclaims any such inference from his doctrine; but in this, as in other respects, Mr. Olney develops it. He lays down that the inexpedient and unnatural character of the union between a European and American State is so obvious that it "will hardly be denied."

Her Majesty's Government are prepared emphatically to deny it on behalf of both the British and American people who are subject to her Crown. They maintain that the union between Great Britain and her territories in the Western Hemisphere is both natural and expedient. They fully concur with the view which President Monroe apparently entertained, that any disturbance of the existing territorial distribution in that hemisphere by any fresh acquisitions on the part of any European State would be a highly inexpedient change. But they are not prepared to admit that the recognition of that expediency is clothed with the sanction which belongs to a doctrine of international law. They are not prepared to admit that the interests of the United States are necessarily concerned in every frontier dispute which may arise between any two of the States who possess dominion in the Western Hemisphere, and still less can they accept the doctrine that the United States are entitled to claim that the process of arbitration shall be applied to any demand for the surrender of territory which one of those States may make against another.

I have commented in the above remarks only upon the general aspect of Mr. Olney's doctrines, apart from the special considerations which attach to the controversy between the United Kingdom and Venezuela in its present phase. This controversy has undoubtedly been made more difficult by the inconsiderate action of the Venezuelan Government in breaking off relations with Her Majesty's Government, and its settlement has been correspondingly delayed; but Her Majesty's Government have not surrendered the hope that it will be adjusted by a reasonable arrangement at an early date.

I request that you will read the substance of the above dispatch to Mr. Olney, and leave him a copy if he desires it. S.

LORD SALISBURY TO SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

No. 190.] FOREIGN OFFICE, November 26, 1895.

SIR: In my preceding dispatch of to-day's date I have replied only to the latter portion of Mr. Olney's dispatch of the 20th July last, which treats of the application of the Monroe doctrine to the question of the boundary dispute between Venezuela and the colony of British Guiana. But it seems desirable, in order to remove some evident misapprehensions as to the main features of the question, that the statement of it contained in the earlier portion of Mr. Olney's dispatch should not be left without reply. Such a course will be the more convenient, because, in consequence of the suspension of diplomatic relations, I shall not have the opportunity of setting right misconceptions of this kind in the ordinary way in a dispatch addressed to the Venezuelan Government itself.

Her Majesty's Government, while they have never avoided or declined argument on the subject with the Government of Venezuela, have always held that the question was one which had no direct bearing on the material interests of any other country, and have consequently refrained hitherto from presenting any detailed statement of their case either to the United States or to other foreign Governments.

It is perhaps a natural consequence of this circumstance that Mr. Olney's narration of what has passed bears the impress of being mainly, if not entirely, founded on ex parte statements emanating from Venezuela, and gives, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, an erroneous view of many material facts.

Mr. Olney commences his observations by remarking that "the dispute is of ancient date, and began at least as early as the time when Great Britain acquired by the treaty with the Netherlands in 1814 the establishments of Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice. From that time to the present the dividing line between these establishments, now called British Guiana, and Venezuela has never ceased to be subject of contention."

This statement is founded on misconception. The dispute on the subject of the frontier did not, in fact, commence till after the year 1840.

The title of Great Britain to the territory in question is derived, in the first place, from conquest and military occupation of the Dutch settlements in 1796. Both on this occasion and at the time of a previous occupation of those settlements in 1781 the British authorities marked the western boundary of their possessions as beginning some distance up the Orinoco beyond Point Barima, in accordance with the limits claimed and actually held by the Dutch, and this has always since remained the frontier claimed by Great Britain. The definitive cession of the Dutch settlements to England was, as Mr. Olney states, placed on record by the treaty of 1814, and although the Spanish Government were parties to the negotiations which led to that treaty they did not at any stage of them raise objection to the frontiers claimed by Great Britain, though these were perfectly well known to them. At that time the Government of Venezuela had not been recognized even by the United States, though the province was already in revolt against the Spanish Government, and had declared its independence. No question of frontier was raised with Great Britain either by it or by the Government of the United States of Colombia, in which it became merged in 1819. That Government, indeed, on repeated occasions, acknowledged its indebtedness to Great Britain for her friendly attitude. When in 1830 the Republic of Venezuela assumed a separate existence its Government was equally warm in its expressions of gratitude and friendship, and there was not at the time any indication of an intention to raise such claims as have been urged by it during the latter portion of this century.

It is true, as stated by Mr. Olney, that in the Venezuelan constitution of 1830 article 5 lays down that "the territory of Venezuela comprises all that which previously to the political changes of 1810 was denominated the Captaincy-General of Venezuela." Similar declarations had been made in the fundamental laws promulgated in 1819 and 1821.

I need not point out that a declaration of this kind made by a newly self-constituted State can have no valid force as against international arrangements previously concluded by the nation from which it has separated itself.

But the present difficulty would never have arisen if the Government of Venezuela had been content to claim only those territories which could be proved or even reasonably asserted to have been practically in the possession and under the effective jurisdiction of the Captaincy-General of Venezuela.

There is no authoritative statement by the Spanish Government of those territories for a decree which the Venezuelan Government allege to have been issued by the King of Spain in 1768, describing the Province of Guiana as bordered on the south by the Amazon and on the east by the Atlantic, certainly can not be regarded as such. It absolutely ignores the Dutch settlements, which not only existed in fact, but had been formally recognized by the treaty of Munster of 1648, and it would, if now considered valid, transfer to Venezuela the whole of the British, Dutch, and French Guianas, and an enormous tract of territory belonging to Brazil.

But of the territories claimed and actually occupied by the Dutch, which were those acquired from them by Great Britain, there exist the most authentic declarations. In 1759, and again in 1769, the States General of Holland addressed formal remonstrances to the Court of Madrid against the incursions of the Spaniards into their posts and settlements in the basin of the Cuyuni. In these remonstrances they distinctly claimed all the branches of the Essequibo River, and especially the Cuyuni River, as lying within Dutch territory. They demanded immediate reparation for the proceedings of the Spaniards and reinstatement of the posts said to have been injured by them, and suggested that a proper delineation between the colony of Essequibo and the Rio Orinoco should be laid down by authority.

To this claim the Spanish Government never attempted to make any reply. But it is evident from the archieves which are preserved in Spain and to which, by the courtesy of the Spanish Government, reference has been made, that the council of state did not consider that they had the means of rebutting it, and that neither they nor the governor of Cumana were prepared seriously to maintain the claims which were suggested in reports from his subordinate officer, the commandant of Guiana. These reports were characterized by the Spanish ministers as insufficient and unsatisfactory, as "professing to show the Province of Guiana under too favorable a light," and finally by the council of state as appearing from other information to be "very improbable." They form, however, with a map which accompanied them, the evidence on which the Venezuelan Government appear most to rely, though it may be observed that among other documents which have from time to time been produced or referred to by them in the course of the discussions is a bull of Pope Alexander VI in 1493, which, if it is to be considered as having any present validity, would take from the Government of the United States all title to jurisdiction on the continent of North America.

The fundamental principle underlying the Venezuelan argument is, in fact, that, inasmuch as Spain was originally entitled of right to the whole of the American Continent, any territory on that continent which she can not be shown to have acknowledged in positive and specific terms to have passed to another power can only have been acquired by wrongful usurpation, and if situated to the north of the Amazon and west of the Atlantic must necessarily belong to Venezuela, as her self-constituted inheritor in those regions. It may reasonably be asked whether Mr. Olney would consent to refer to the arbitration of another power pretensions raised by the Government of Mexico on such a foundation to large tracts of territory which had long been comprised in the Federation.

The circumstances connected with the marking of what is called the "Schomburgk" line are as follows:

In 1835 a grant was made by the British Government for the exploration of the interior of the British colony, and Mr. (afterwards Sir Robert) Schomburgk, who was employed on this service, on his return to the capital of the colony in July, 1839, called the attention of the Government to the necessity for an early demarcation of its boundaries. He was in consequence appointed in November, 1840, special commissioner for provisionally surveying and delimiting the boundaries of British Guiana, and notice of the appointment was given to the Governments concerned, including that of Venezuela.

The intention of Her Majesty's Government at that time was, when the work of the commissioner had been completed, to communicate to the other Governments their views as to the true boundary of the British colony, and then to settle any details to which those Governments might take objection.

It is important to notice that Sir R. Schomburgk did not discover or invent any new boundaries. He took particular care to fortify himself with the history of the case. He had further, from actual exploration and information obtained from the Indians, and from the evidence of local remains, as at Barima, and local traditions, as on the Cuyuni, fixed the limits of the Dutch possessions, and the zone from which all trace of Spanish influence was absent. On such data he based his reports.

At the very outset of his mission he surveyed Point Barima, where the remains of a Dutch fort still existed, and placed there and at the mouth of the Amacura two boundary posts. At the urgent entreaty of the Venezuelan Government these two posts were afterwards removed, as stated by Mr. Olney, but this concession was made on the distinct understanding that Great Britain did not thereby in any way abandon her claim to that position.

In submitting the maps of his survey, on which he indicated the line which he would propose to Her Majesty's Government for adoption, Sir R. Schomburgk called attention to the fact that Her Majesty's Government might justly claim the whole basin of the Cuyuni and Yuruari, on the ground that the natural boundary of the colony included any territory through which flow rivers which fall into the Essequibo. "Upon this principle," he wrote, "the boundary line would run from the sources of the Carumani toward the sources of the Cuyuni proper, and from thence toward its far more northern tributaries, the rivers Iruary (Yuruari) and Iruang (Yuruan), and thus approach the very heart of Venezuelan Guiana." But, on grounds of complaisance toward Venezuela, he proposed that Great Britain should consent to surrender her claim to a more extended frontier inland in return for the formal recognition of her right to Point Barima. It was on this principle that he drew the boundary line which has since been called by his name.

Undoubtedly, therefore, Mr. Olney is right when he states that "it seems impossible to treat the Schomburgk line as being the boundary claimed by Great Britain as a matter of right, or as anything but a line originating in considerations of convenience and expediency." The Schomburgk line was in fact a great reduction of the boundary claimed by Great Britain as matter of right, and its proposal originated in a desire to come to a speedy and friendly arrangement with a weaker power with whom Great Britain was at the time, and desired to remain, in cordial relations.

The following are the main facts of the discussions that ensued with the Venezuelan Government:

While Mr. Schomburgk was engaged on his survey the Venezuelan minister in London had urged Her Majesty's Government to enter into a treaty of limits, but received the answer that, if it should be necessary to enter into such a treaty, a survey was, at any rate, the necessary preliminary, and that this was proceeding.

As soon as Her Majesty's Government were in possession of Mr. Schomburgk's reports, the Venezuelan minister was informed that they were in a position to commence negotiations, and in January, 1844, M. Fortique commenced by stating the claim of his Government.

This claim, starting from such obsolete grounds as the original discovery by Spain of the American Continent, and mainly supported by quotations of a more or less vague character from the writings of travelers and geographers, but adducing no substantial evidence of actual conquest or occupation of the territory claimed, demanded the Essequibo itself as the boundary of Venezuela.

A reply was returned by Lord Aberdeen, then secretary of state for foreign affairs, pointing out that it would be impossible to arrive at any agreement if both sides brought forward pretensions of so extreme a character, but stating that the British Government would not imitate M. Fortique in putting forward a claim which it could not be intended seriously to maintain. Lord Aberdeen then proceeded to announce the concessions which, "out of friendly regard to Venezuela," Her Majesty's Government were prepared to make, and proposed a line starting from the mouth of the Moroco to the junction of the River Barima with the Waini, thence up the Barima to the point at which that stream approached nearest to the Acarabisi, and thence following Sir R. Schomburgk's line from the source of the Acarabisi onward.

A condition was attached to the proffered cession, viz, that the Venezuelan Government should enter into an engagement that no portion of the territory proposed to be ceded should be alienated at any time to a foreign power, and that the Indian tribes residing in it should be protected from oppression.

No answer to the note was ever received from the Venezuelan Government, and in 1850 Her Majesty's Government informed Her Majesty's chargé d'affaires at Carácas that as the proposal had remained for more than six years unaccepted, it must be considered as having lapsed, and authorized him to make a communication to the Venezuelan Government to that effect.

A report having at the time become current in Venezuela that Great Britain intended to seize Venezuelan Guiana, the British Government distinctly disclaimed such an intention, but inasmuch as the Government of Venezuela subsequently permitted projects to be set on foot for the occupation of Point Barima and certain other positions in dispute, the British chargé d'affaires was instructed, in June, 1850, to call the serious attention of the President and Government of Venezuela to the question, and to declare to them "that whilst, on the one hand, Great Britain had no intention to occupy or encroach on the disputed territory, she would not, on the other hand, view with indifference aggressions on that territory by Venezuela."

The Venezuelan Government replied in December of the same year that Venezuela had no intention of occupying or encroaching upon any part of the territory the dominion of which was in dispute, and that orders would be issued to the authorities in Guiana to abstain from taking any steps contrary to this engagement.

This constitutes what has been termed the "agreement of 1850," to which the Government of Venezuela have frequently appealed, but which the Venezuelans have repeatedly violated in succeeding years.

Their first acts of this nature consisted in the occupation of fresh positions to the east of their previous settlements, and the founding in 1858 of the town of Nueva Providencia on the right bank of the Yuruari, all previous settlements being on the left bank. The British Government, however, considering that these settlements were so near positions which they had not wished to claim, considering also the difficulty of controlling the movements of mining populations, overlooked this breach of the agreement.

The governor of the colony was in 1857 sent to Caracas to negotiate for a settlement of the boundary, but he found the Venezuelan State in so disturbed a condition that it was impossible to commence negotiations, and eventually he came away without having effected anything.

For the next nineteen years, as stated by Mr. Olney, the civil commotions in Venezuela prevented any resumption of negotiations.

In 1876 it was reported that the Venezuelan Government had, for the second time, broken "the agreement of 1850" by granting licenses to trade and cut wood in Barima and eastward. Later in the same year that Government once more made an overture for the settlement of the boundary. Various delays interposed before negotiations actually commenced; and it was not till 1879 that Señor Rojaz began them with a renewal of the claim to the Essequibo as the eastern boundary of Venezuelan Guiana. At the same time he stated that his Government wished "to obtain, by means of a treaty, a definitive settlement of the question, and was disposed to proceed to the demarcation of the divisional line between the two Guianas in a spirit of conciliation and true friendship toward Her Majesty's Government."

In reply to this communication a note was addressed to Señor Rojaz on the 10th of January, 1880, reminding him that the boundary which Her Majesty's Government claimed, as a matter of strict right on grounds of conquest and concession by treaty, commenced at a point at the mouth of the Orinoco, westward of Point Barima, that it proceeded thence in a southerly direction to the Imataca Mountains, the line of which it followed to the northwest, passing from thence by the high land of Santa Maria just south of the town of Upata until it struck a range of hills on the eastern bank of the Caroni River, following these southward until it struck the great backbone of the Guiana district, the Barima Mountains of British Guiana, and thence southward to the Pacaraima Mountains. On the other hand, the claim which had been put forward on behalf of Venezuela by Gen. Guzman Blanco in his message to the National Congress of the 20th of February, 1877, would involve the surrender of a province now inhabited by 40,000 British subjects, and which had been in the uninterrupted possession of Holland and of Great Britain successively for two centuries.

The difference between these two claims being so great, it was pointed out to Señor Rojaz that, in order to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement, each party must be prepared to make very considerable concessions to the other, and he was assured that, although the claim of Venezuela to the Essequibo River boundary could not, under any circumstances, be entertained, yet that Her Majesty's Government were anxious to meet the Venezuelan Government in a spirit of conciliation, and would be willing, in the event of a renewal of negotiations for the general settlement of boundaries, to waive a portion of what they considered to be their strict rights if Venezuela were really disposed to make corresponding concessions on her part.

The Venezuelan minister replied in February, 1881, by proposing a line which commenced on the coast a mile to the north of the Moroco River, and followed certain parallels and meridians inland, bearing a general resemblance to the proposal made by Lord Aberdeen in 1844.

Señor Rojaz's proposal was referred to the lieutenant-general and attorney-general of British Guiana, who were then in England, and they presented an elaborate report, showing that in the thirty-five years which had elapsed since Lord Aberdeen's proposed concession natives and others had settled in the territory under the belief that they would enjoy the benefits of British rule, and that it was impossible to assent to any such concessions as Señor Rojaz's line would involve. They, however, proposed an alternative line which involved considerable reductions of that laid down by Sir R. Schomburgk.

This boundary was proposed to the Venezuelan Government by Lord Granville in September, 1881, but no answer was ever returned by that Government to the proposal.

While, however, the Venezuelan minister constantly stated that the matter was under active consideration, it was found that in the same year a concession had been given by his Government to General Pulgar which included a large portion of the territory in dispute. This was the third breach by Venezuela of the agreement of 1850.

Early in 1884 news arrived of a fourth breach by Venezuela of the agreement of 1850 through two different grants which covered the whole of the territory in dispute, and as this was followed by actual attempts to settle on the disputed territory, the British Government could no longer remain inactive.

Warning was therefore given to the Venezuelan Government and to the concessionnaires, and a British magistrate was sent into the threatened district to assert the British rights.

Meanwhile the negotiations for a settlement of the boundary had continued, but the only replies that could be obtained from Señor Guzman Blanco, the Venezuelan minister, were proposals for arbitration in different forms, all of which Her Majesty's Government were compelled to decline as involving a submission to the arbitrator of the claim advanced by Venezuela in 1844 to all territory up to the left bank of the Essequibo.

As the progress of settlement by British subjects made a decision of some kind absolutely necessary, and as the Venezuelan Government refused to come to any reasonable arrangement, Her Majesty's Government decided not to repeat the offer of concessions which had not been reciprocated, but to assert their undoubted right to the territory within the Schomburgk line, while still consenting to hold open for further negotiation, and even for arbitration, the unsettled lands between that line and what they considered to be the rightful boundary, as stated in the note to Señor Rojaz of the 10th of January, 1880.

The execution of this decision was deferred for a time, owing to the return of Señor Guzman Blanco to London, and the desire of Lord Rosebery, then secretary of state for foreign affairs, to settle all pending questions between the two Governments. Mr. Olney is mistaken in supposing that in 1886 "a treaty was practically agreed upon containing a general arbitration clause, under which the parties might have submitted the boundary dispute to the decision of a third power, or of several powers in amity with both." It is true that Gen. Guzman Blanco proposed that the commercial treaty between the two countries should contain a clause of this nature, but it had reference to future disputes only. Her Majesty's Government have always insisted on a separate discussion of the frontier question, and have considered its settlement to be a necessary preliminary to other arrangements. Lord Rosebery's proposal, made in July, 1886, was "that the two Governments should agree to consider the territory lying between the boundary lines respectively proposed in the eighth paragraph of Señor Rojaz's note of the 21st of February, 1881, and in Lord Granville's note of the 15th of September, 1881, as the territory in dispute between the two countries, and that a boundary line within the limits of this territory should be traced either by an arbitrator or by a joint commission on the basis of an equal division of this territory, due regard being had to natural boundaries."

Señor Guzman Blanco replied declining the proposal, and repeating that arbitration on the whole claim of Venezuela was the only method of solution which he could suggest. This pretension is hardly less exorbitant than would be a refusal by Great Britain to agree to an arbitration on the boundary of British Columbia and Alaska unless the United States would consent to bring into question one-half of the whole area of the latter territory. He shortly afterwards left England, and as there seemed no hope of arriving at an agreement by further discussions, the Schomburgk line was proclaimed as the irreducible boundary of the colony in October, 1886. It must be borne in mind that in taking this step Her Majesty's Government did not assert anything approaching their extreme claim, but confined themselves within the limits of what had, as early as 1840, been suggested as a concession out of friendly regard and complaisance.

When Señor Guzman Blanco, having returned to Venezuela, announced his intention of erecting a light-house at Point Barima, the British Government expressed their readiness to permit this if he would enter into a formal written agreement that its erection would not be held to prejudice their claim to the site.

In the meanwhile the Venezuelan Government had sent commissioners into the territory to the east of the Schomburgk line, and on their return two notes were addressed to the British minister at Caracas, dated, respectively, the 26th and 31st January, 1887, demanding the evacuation of the whole territory held by Great Britain from the mouth of the Orinoco to the Pomeroon River, and adding that should this not be done by the 20th February, and should the evacuation not be accompanied by the acceptance of arbitration as the means of deciding the pending frontier question, diplomatic relations would be broken off. In pursuance of this decision the British representative at Caracas received his passports, and relations were declared by the Venezuelan Government to be suspended on the 21st February, 1887.

In December of that year, as a matter of precaution, and in order that the claims of Great Britain beyond the Schomburgk line might not be considered to have been abandoned, a notice was issued by the governor of British Guiana formally reserving those claims. No steps have, however, at any time been taken by the British authorities to exercise jurisdiction beyond the Schomburgk line, nor to interfere with the proceedings of the Venezuelans in the territory outside of it, although, pending a settlement of the dispute, Great Britain can not recognize those proceedings as valid, or as conferring any legitimate title.

The question has remained in this position ever since. The bases on which Her Majesty's Government were prepared to negotiate for its settlement were clearly indicated to the Venezuelan plenipotentiaries who were successively dispatched to London in 1890, 1891, and 1893 to negotiate for a renewal of diplomatic relations; but as on those occasions the only solutions which the Venezuelan Government professed themselves ready to accept would still have involved the submission to arbitration of the Venezuelan claim to a large portion of the British colony, no progress has yet been made toward a settlement.

It will be seen from the preceding statement that the Government of Great Britain have from the first held the same view as to the extent of territory which they are entitled to claim as a matter of right. It comprised the coast line up to the River Amacura and the whole basin of the Essequibo River and its tributaries. A portion of that claim, however, they have always been willing to waive altogether; in regard to another portion, they have been and continue to be perfectly ready to submit the question of their title to arbitration. As regards the rest, that which lies within the so-called Schomburgk line, they do not consider that the rights of Great Britain are open to question. Even within that line they have, on various occasions, offered to Venezuela considerable concessions as a matter of friendship and conciliation, and for the purpose of securing an amicable settlement of the dispute. If as time has gone on the concessions thus offered diminished in extent, and have now been withdrawn, this has been the necessary conseqence of the gradual spread over the country of British settlements, which Her Majesty's Government can not in justice to the inhabitants offer to surrender to foreign rule, and the justice of such withdrawal is amply borne out by the researches in the national archives of Holland and Spain, which have furnished further and more convincing evidence in support of the British claims.

The discrepancies in the frontiers assigned to the British colony in various maps published in England, and erroneously assumed to be founded on official information, are easily accounted for by the circumstances which I have mentioned. Her Majesty's Government can not, of course, be responsible for such publications made without their authority.

Although the negotiations in 1890, 1891, and 1893 did not lead to any result, Her Majesty's Government have not abandoned the hope that they may be resumed with better success, and that when the internal politics of Venezuela are settled on a more durable basis than has lately appeared to be the case her Government may be enabled to adopt a more moderate and conciliatory course in regard to this question than that of their predecessors. Her Majesty's Government are sincerely desirous of being on friendly relations with Venezuela, and certainly have no design to seize territory that properly belongs to her, or forcibly to extend sovereignty over any portion of her population.

They have, on the contrary, repeatedly expressed their readiness to submit to arbitration the conflicting claims of Great Britain and Venezuela to large tracts of territory which from their auriferous nature are known to be of the almost untold value. But they can not consent to entertain, or to submit to arbitration of another power or of foreign jurists, however eminent, claims based on the extravagant pretensions of Spanish officials in the last century, and involving the transfer of large numbers of British subjects, who have for many years enjoyed the settled rule of a British colony, to a nation of different race and language, whose political system is subject to frequent disturbance, and whose institutions as yet too often afford very inadequate protection to life and property. No issue of this description has ever been involved in the questions which Great Britain and the United States have consented to submit to arbitration, and Her Majesty's Government are convinced that in similar circumstances the Government of the United States would be equally firm in declining to entertain proposals of such a nature.

Your excellency is authorized to state the substance of this dispatch to Mr. Olney, and to leave him a copy of it if he should desire it.

Mr. MORGAN. I move the reference of the message which has just been read, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the Committee on Foreign Relations may have leave to sit during any recess of Congress that may occur.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there is no special business pending, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 18, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under Rule XXIV, clause 2, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of the acts, resolutions, and journals of the Oklahoma legislature, together with copies of the compiled statutes of the Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, relating to the annual report of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of the acts, resolutions, memorials, and journals of the Territorial legislature of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of the acts, memorials, resolutions, and journals of the Eighteenth legislative assembly of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination as to the sum of money necessary to acquire by purchase the locks and dams on the Monongahela River, Pennsylvania, and also as to the value, etc., of said improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GARRETT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, in paper covers, 6,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895, of which 2,000 shall be for use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

PORTS OF ENTRY, INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to concur in a Senate amendment to a House bill that was passed here the other day on the motion of my colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, who is absent at this time. The matter was brought up yesterday and at the request of my colleague, Mr. SMITH, it went over. He has since examined the bill and is quite content with the proposed action.

The bill (H. R. 808) was read.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Amend in line 14, after the word "law," by inserting "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the provisions of the act approved August 7, 1882, which embraces East St. Louis, Ill., within the limits of the port of St. Louis, Mo."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the question will be on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, when my colleague, Mr. CANNON, called up this bill, I did not rise for the purpose of objecting to its consideration, but as there is a port within my district, I desired to ascertain whether the passage of this bill would in any manner affect the status of that port. I have since examined the question and find that it does not, and therefore I have no objection to the passage of the bill with this amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSE RULES.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to clause 1 of Rule X, and also to Rule XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended as follows, namely:

"That clause 1 of Rule X read as follows:

"'1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint, at the commencement of each Congress, the following standing committees, viz:

"'On Elections, three committees, to consist of nine members each, to be called number one (1), two (2), and three (3), respectively.
"'On Ways and Means, to consist of seventeen members.
"'On Appropriations, to consist of seventeen members.
"'On the Judiciary, to consist of seventeen members.

"'On Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the War Department, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the Navy Department, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the Interior Department, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, to consist of seven members.
"'On Expenditures on Public Buildings, to consist of seven members.
"'On Rules, to consist of five members.
"'On Accounts, to consist of nine members.
"'On Mileage, to consist of five members.'
"Also the following joint standing committees, viz:
"'On the Library, to consist of three members.
"'On Printing, to consist of three members.
"'On Enrolled Bills, to consist of seven members.'
"That clause 1 of Rule XI read as follows:
"'1. To the election of members: to the respective committees on elections.'
"In clause 7 of Rule XI, strike out the words 'Committee on Commerce' and insert the words 'Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.'
"After clause 34 of Rule XI, insert the following:
"'35. To reform the civil service: to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service;
"'36. To the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress: to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress;
"'37. To alcoholic liquor traffic: to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic;
"'38. To the irrigation of arid lands: to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands;
"'39. To immigration or naturalization: to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization;
"'40. To ventilation and acoustics: to the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.'
"That the numbering of clauses 35 to 52, inclusive, of Rule XI, be changed to conform to the foregoing amendment."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If I have the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], I suggest that the amendment here proposed be adopted by unanimous consent except (if he so desires) that the clause touching the Committee on Elections—the amendments proposed to clause 1 of Rule X and clause 1 of Rule X — be left undisposed of. The other amendments, about which, as I understand from the gentleman from Georgia, there is no contest, might, by unanimous consent, be considered at once and adopted.

Mr. CRISP. The other amendments which the gentleman asks be adopted by unanimous consent relate simply to increasing the number of members on various committees. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. I think there is no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then, I ask that by unanimous consent this amendment, except as to the clauses indicated, be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that this proposed amendment, except those parts relating to clause 1 of Rule X and clause 1 of Rule XI, be adopted by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the remainder of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The action just taken by the House renders it unnecessary for me to refer to the matters covered by such action. Of the amendments remaining undisposed of, the first provides—

That clause 1 of Rule X read as follows:
"On elections, three committees, to consist of nine members each, to be numbered one, two, and three, respectively."

The amendment, as will be seen, proposes to create three committees of nine members each.

A MEMBER. Two new committees?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, it will create three committees of nine members each in lieu of the single committee authorized by the rules now.

Then, in Rule XI, clause 1 shall read as follows:

In making assignments of election cases:
To the elections of members: To the respective committees on elections.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, both of these amendments should be adopted. The last necessarily would be if the first is, so that the only question presented by the amendment is whether or not the rule of the Fifty-first Congress—or the rule of this Congress already adopted—providing for one Committee on Elections, to consist of 15 members, shall be so amended as to strike out "one" and "fifteen" and make it read "three Committees on Elections of nine members each." The necessity, in my judgment, for the adoption of the amendment arises from the peculiar condition of the business touching contests before this House.

Perhaps, with one exception, there never has been so great a number of contests as are now pending for the decision of the House. As gentlemen are aware, the House is the only judge of the election and qualifications of its members. The law provides the manner in which contests shall be made.

I hold in my hand a report from the Clerk touching these cases, and I beg the attention of the members present while I speak of these thirty-two cases and the amount of work their consideration will involve. Four of these cases come from the State of Alabama, one from the State of Georgia, two from the State of Kentucky, three from the State of Louisiana, one from Maryland, one from Missouri, one from Mississippi, three from North Carolina, four from South Carolina, three from the State of Texas, and four from the State of Virginia, making twenty-seven of the thirty-two contests coming from the so-called Southern States. A mere statement of this fact will convince gentlemen who are familiar with the proceedings of former Congresses in connection with election contests that the lifetime of this Congress will pass before one-half of these cases could be considered by one Committee on Elections and reported to the House and considered by it.

But let us look for a moment to the amount of work involved. The printed record in these cases averages 530 pages of testimony, and the brief added thereto would make 625 pages, that being the average of the printed record in each case. With reference to the politics involved in these cases, if I may speak for a moment of that branch of the subject connected with the contests pending, all of the contestees are Democrats. Twenty-two of the 32 contestants are Republicans, 8 are Populists, 1 is an Independent Democrat, and 1 a Fusionist.

In the Forty-first Congress there were about the same number of cases pending. Eleven had been disposed of by the House, leaving twenty-four pending, if I recollect aright, or about that number, with an average record, not of 600 pages, but of 420 pages; and the Committee on Rules unanimously reported an order that the Committee on Elections be increased to fifteen members, that it be divided into subcommittees of three, that these subcommittees should report to the House on the cases presented to them, thus practically making five Elections Committees, although there was but one in name. That rule brought the House to the consideration of cases on the report of three of the members of the Committee on Elections, the cases never having received the consideration or report of the full committee. The amendment proposed here does not suggest such a method as that. It was thought best that the subcommittees should review the cases, go through the records, and report to the full committee, so that the House would have the opinion of nine members of the House acting as a Committee of Elections upon each one of the contested cases. In the Forty-first Congress the order to which I have referred, and which was adopted, was reported by Mr. Garfield. Mr. Cox and Mr. Brooks, on the minority of the Committee on Rules, cordially indorsed the order, because it was evident then, as it is evident now, that under the ordinary machinery the cases could not be reached and heard at all.

Let me refer for a moment to the disposition of cases in former Congresses for the benefit of gentlemen who have not personal recollection touching them. In the Forty-eighth Congress there were fourteen cases of contested elections—eleven of them were acted upon in the House. In the Forty-ninth Congress there were ten cases, and only four, I think, were acted upon by the House. In the Fiftieth Congress there were eight contests, and seven of them were acted upon by the House. In the Fifty-first Congress seventeen contests were made, and twelve were disposed of in the House. In the Fifty-second Congress there were six contests, and only four were disposed of in the House; and in the Fifty-third Congress, eleven contests, and only seven were acted upon by the House.

So it will be seen that each one of these proposed three committees will have before it more work than the average work that has been cast upon one committee heretofore. Now, gentlemen will recollect that in former Congresses, toward the end of a Congress, the public business has pressed to that degree that the House could not find time to dispose of election cases, and there has frequently been a denial of justice to contestants or of vindication to contestees. Early in the first session of a Congress the House has its greatest leisure, and it is hoped that if these three committees are created they will give such proper consideration to these cases and make such early report that the House, before it is overwhelmed by other public business, can in an orderly manner dispose of the cases upon their merits.

It may be objected—I do not know that it will be—that this is unduly hurrying the consideration of election cases. That objection will not lie upon the merits. I wish that we had enough of the attributes of the Deity in this House to know the very right touching each one of these cases, so that we could know in fact which one, the contestant or the contestee, was elected, and that we could settle it in the twinkling of an eye. Because then the constituency would be truly represented. In the absence of that knowledge the best we can do is to settle them as early as they can be settled upon the law of the fact.

One other remark. We have upon this side of the House 20 more members now than two-thirds of the House. We are rich in membership; and I may say, in passing, to this side of the House—it is not entirely pertinent—as I get acquainted with the membership it seems to me that we are rich in quality as well as in numbers. Whatever may have been the case in former Congresses, I apprehend if there have been abuses touching election cases, that honors are easy. There is no purpose and no temptation at this time to do anything else except to decide cases according to the very right; and so far as I have knowledge or belief, no contestant has been led to believe for a moment that he can have any standing in the House of Representatives unless he has a standing upon the facts; and I believe, aye, more, while I am not a prophet, I am willing to prophesy here and now that in the decision of these election cases the record of the Fifty-fourth Congress will stand out as a good example in the decision of these cases according to the very right. I care not what the man's politics may be, he is not entitled to have a seat in this House unless the people chose him. I care not what his politics may be, he is entitled to a seat in this House if a majority or plurality of his people said so.

It is apt that we inquire a minute as to the sound policy, at this time especially, of disposing of these cases as rapidly as they can be readily disposed of. It is wonderful, when I restate it, that twenty-seven of these cases come from the Southland and only five come from the North.

Now, I am not here to make any charges against the South, but I apprehend there is a condition of affairs there that, in justice to Republicans, in justice to Populists, in justice to Democrats as well, these contests should be disposed of. I have no desire here to arouse anything like partisan feeling or to talk of one section of the country at the expense of the other. But men of middle age understand what has been taking place for the last thirty years in the United States. All of us recollect something of the civil war and of the great contest for reconstruction—of the clothing with citizenship of a whole race of people who had been in bondage. All of us understand the complaints that were made by large sections of the Southern people, somewhat at times, no doubt, through prejudice, and somewhat at times, perhaps, upon the merits, that they were largely left at the mercy of those who had lately been in bondage and who were without, on the average, sufficient intelligence to rule over their localities.

I do not desire to go into that subject; but suffice it to say, it will not be contested upon either side of the House that throughout the southern portion of the so-called South, especially, through these years, first by force the lately enfranchised citizens were deprived of the ballot. Later on by fraud they were deprived of the ballot, and the men who deprived them, when taxed with it, proclaimed that that was the only alternative, as they claimed, that stood between them and local destruction. The years rolled by, and with the Federal election laws upon the statute book, laws that in my judgment were unduly criticised, they were enabled, first by violence and then by manipulation, to make their section substantially solid, and substantially solid in favor of one party. In the fullness of time, as we got more knowledge North, and as they got more knowledge South, and as the prejudices faded away, wisely or unwisely as the case may be, whatever there was of Federal legislation touching Federal elections, whether good or bad, was swept from the statute book and the late elections were held throughout the length and breadth of the country without the aid of the Federal election laws. What was the result? They had the condition in the South which they had long proclaimed that they wanted, namely, that under the operation of State laws and a local sentiment that had, as they claimed, its foothold in righteousness and justice, they would regulate their own local affairs and send to the National Congress their representatives, and that they would send them according to the will of the majority.

Now, it is alleged that in this, the first election, I believe—if not the first, the second—since the repeal of the Federal election laws, it is alleged by many people whose footsteps are rooted in the soil of the South, who were born there, who love her institutions, who are native to the section—it is alleged by them, not by ones, by tens, or by thousands, but by multiplied thousands, that with this change there was no longer power in the former dominant party to draw the color line and frighten the white people there, threatening them with colored domination; and at last it was claimed in the late canvass that white men stood looking white men in the face and said, "We will not divide and we can not divide upon the color line, but we will divide and vote touching the proper economic policies that will bring the greatest good to the greatest number, North and South, East and West." It is alleged that they did so divide. Now, there are large blocks of people in the State of Alabama, in the State of Tennessee, in the States of South and North Carolina, and other Southern States, that proclaim and say, whatever the truth may be (I am speaking of what they allege), that while force did not dominate in the last elections, frauds still continued, and that the dominant party, which had justified this action of many years' standing to turn down the colored vote, turned its hand, clothed with fraud, upon their white brethren and fraudulently turned them down.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman tell me a single instance in Tennessee where that state of affairs has occurred?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I intended to come to that; but I will answer it right here, as I am challenged.

Mr. COX. I challenge you.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will ask the Clerk to read as marked.

Mr. COX. That is in a newspaper.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It will speak for itself, and then I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COX. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

"What of the political outlook in Tennessee?"

"It will be a miracle if the Democrats are successful in electing their State ticket next year. In common with thousands of other Democrats who voted for Governor Turney, I condemned the counting out of H. Clay Evans. Whatever may have been done in the past, there is no longer any excuse for carrying elections by fraud. The time has come when absolute fairness and justice must prevail in the choice of public officials. There isn't a shadow of danger of negro domination in Tennessee. We have the Australian ballot law, which excludes the ignorant voter, and so the intelligence of the State will dominate just as it has in the past.

"But the fair-minded and honorable men, who constitute the great majority of the Democratic party in the State, are sick and tired of the machine methods and devious practices that have been so long in use by a political ring at Nashville, and the prospects are bright for the permanent turning down of this office-holding clique. The election of the Republican ticket next year will be the answer to the counting out of Evans, and no doubt many Democrats will contribute to this result."

Mr. COX. What paper is that in?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In a moment. The Clerk will please send me the slip.

Mr. COX. Let me see what paper that is from?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will give the gentleman exactly the source it comes from.

Mr. COX. That is right; let us be fair now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am going to.

This is from an interview in the Washington Post of this morning with Mr. A. B. Pickett, editor of the Memphis Scimitar, as I am informed, a Democratic paper of long standing, and while I am not acquainted with this gentleman, he is said to be a man of character. I do not know him personally.

Mr. COX. Now you are basing your argument upon what a correspondent says to a newspaper.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will answer further; I have not made any charge against Tennessee, Alabama, or any other State. I took care not to precipitate a partisan debate by making any claim as to what the facts were. I said "it was alleged" by multiplied thousands of white people of character, born and reared in Tennessee and elsewhere throughout the Southern country, that in the late elections fraud was resorted to against white people that did not agree with them, as it had frequently been resorted to against the colored people upon the plea that it had to be resorted to there in local self-defense.

Now, then, in further answer to the gentleman, as a matter of common history, I do know that H. Clay Evans was reported to have been elected governor of the State of Tennessee. I do not know whether he was elected or not; but I do know that from time to time, so far as I am informed, the Republicans unanimously claimed that he was elected, and that a very large per cent of the Democracy denounced his counting out and seating his opponent as fraudulent. I will ask the gentleman, as he is from Tennessee, whether that per cent of his own party that so proclaimed are men of character?

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I just want a brief answer.

Mr. COX. I will make it as brief as I can. Do not curtail me.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, well, I will not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. COX. All right; but when you put a question to me I am not going to answer it except in my own way.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman will have an opportunity in his own time to answer.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, if the gentleman determines to exclude me, that is all right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman tell me what this has to do——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me suggest that the Nashville Banner and the Chattanooga Times are Democratic newspapers, and I will ask whether they did not constantly and do not now insist that Mr. Evans was elected governor?

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that neither one of the papers is a Democratic paper.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will yield now to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]. What was his question?

Mr. McMILLIN. What I wanted to know was this: My friend from Illinois is generally pointed in our discussions here and sticks to the question, but I want to ask him what an election in Tennessee has to do with his proposition to make a three-headed Committee on Elections for the consideration of the thirty-odd cases that are pending here? The gubernatorial contest in Tennessee which was finally determined by the kind of investigation that was provided for in the State constitution of 1870 has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is not a single contest from Tennessee.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is not a single contest from the State of Tennessee, and if the gentleman from Illinois will keep his own linen clean he will do exceedingly well. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I had not referred to his State, as I recollect, until his colleague [Mr. COX] challenged me.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. COX (to Mr. CANNON). You made the assault first.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not yield.

Mr. COX. Pardon me one moment. I——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No, sir; I do not yield.

Mr. COX. Now, you ought to concede that you made the assault before I opened my mouth. You ought to let me make that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not just now.

Mr. COX. All right. Do not jump, though, until you know what you are doing. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I again say that I commenced my remarks by stating that twenty-seven of the thirty-two contests now pending came from Southern States, and only five from the so-called Northern States. I do not know, nor do I charge, that there have been unfair elections recently in any State in the South, but I do know that in former years I heard gentlemen standing on this floor defend frauds in elections, alleging that they were necessary in self-defense to escape the control of the colored vote. I do know, further, that, with the Federal election laws repealed, and with only the local laws of the various States to rely upon, with the division in the white vote down South which has come at last, thank God, great numbers of gentlemen from Alabama and from other places in the South allege that fraud was committed in the late elections. Some of these gentlemen say they are Populists; some say they are Republicans; and they allege that frauds have been committed against them.

I repeat, I do not know what the facts may be, but if I were to go into the domain of speculation I would guess that where fraud had formerly been legalized and justified, from any standpoint or under any necessity, it would take time after the alleged necessity had passed away to recover from the effects of such abuses and to avoid a repetition of them. What the facts may be I do not know, but I am confronted with this fact, unprecedented, that there come here 27 contestants alleging that they were elected, and demanding, what they have a right to demand, that their cases shall be heard and decided fairly and promptly, and that the people of their respective districts—aye, the white people as well as the colored—who exercise the right of suffrage there, shall be truly represented and voiced upon this floor.

If the facts do not throw stones, then I throw none. If there have been abuses there I feel quite sure that both the gentlemen from Tennessee ought to, and I believe that if they will divest themselves of partisanship they will, run swiftfooted along with this side of the House to do exact justice to the people of those election districts.

Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In a moment.

Mr. COX. In the last election in Tennessee your side of the House gained two members, and I want to ask you whether there is a single contest from that State, either by a Democrat or a Republican, in regard to the election of members to this House?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, is the gentleman sorry for that?

Mr. COX. I am glad of it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. So am I.

Mr. COX. Well, then, we are together, and what are you bothering about? [Laughter.] Until you can put your finger upon the point where you say unfairness was committed you ought not to charge it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. "Oh"—that is no answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Gentlemen who have heard me will bear me out in saying that I have been careful, in language, in manner, and in statement, not to allege fraud against anybody. But let me say this to the gentleman: If I can not discuss in this careful manner what is alleged by gentlemen from Alabama, from the Carolinas, and from other States in the South—if I can not mention these allegations, without even indorsing their truth—the allegations of men who are the gentleman's peers and my peers—if I can not repeat what they allege as a basis to gain a standing in the National House of Representatives by way of a contest that will afford them the privilege of demonstrating the facts which they allege, or of having their falsity demonstrated—if I can not speak of these things without the gentlemen growing thick in the blood vessels of the neck and turning upon me with flashing eyes and saying that I am abusing the people of his State, what does it all mean? I am proud of my people and of his people, and he can not find, in my service as a member of the House in the twenty years that I have served here, an instance where I have brought an untrue allegation or have spoken in malice against them at any time.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman pardon me one moment? I do not know how the blood is running in his veins——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What is your question, my friend?

Mr. COX. Hold on. [Laughter.] I have seen your blood run to the top of your head many times——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What is your question?

Mr. COX. Hold on. Do not make insinuations without having any foundation for them. I challenge you to show that there is any contest in this House in regard to a single election of a member of this House from Tennessee. There is not one.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am glad of it.

Mr. COX. So am I.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well; we agree, then.

Mr. COX. Then, why do you make your imputations against us?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh——

Mr. COX. "Oh." Now, you credit us with acting fairly until you can show that we do otherwise.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not yield.

Mr. COX. All right. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I would not interrupt him; but he stretched his blanket until it broke the seams.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I always try, as I have said, to be courteous in this House. The gentleman says there is no contest from Tennessee. I am glad of it. He challenged me to know what of unfairness had been done in the late elections in Tennessee. Without alleging unfairness I said it was alleged by Republicans—and unanimously conceded by a great majority of the Democratic party—that the man who is now governor of Tennessee sits clothed with fraud, as a representative of the minority and not of the majority. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think he has got anything to do with that?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not yield further.

Mr. COX. All right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know whether that allegation is true or not. I pray God it may not be true. But I think I know—at least I believe—one thing. At last the passions, the prejudices, the divisions throughout the length and breadth of this country, North and South, growing out of the civil war with all that it included, have faded away until finally, thank God, there come into this House from the Southland Republicans with their feet in the soil and with character and ability second to none, North or South. [Applause.] I am glad to know and believe that even down in the so-called "black States" the beginning of the end has come, and with that a division between Anglo-Saxons, so that where there is abuse, if there be abuse now, there will be correction of it a little later on. And it is our duty in this House of Representatives, as to these twenty-seven election cases brought here under the circumstances I have spoken of and appealing for an honest, square hearing, to devise the machinery which will determine these cases according to the very fact, and justify the contestants in their accusation or relieve the contestee from the accusation, as the facts may warrant.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I reserve that time.

Mr. CRISP addressed the Chair. (A pause.)

Mr. CRISP. I addressed the Chair some time ago, but have not yet been recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to yield his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and consequently did not look in the direction of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Later on, I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He does not desire to be heard at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, and I am opposed to it because whatever may be the design or purpose of those who propose it, its effect and operation will be injustice to the contestees who are sitting members of this House.

It is all very well to talk about a judicial investigation. The gentleman from Illinois has been a member of this House for twenty years and more, I believe. He protests when on his feet that he only wants justice; and yet he is unable to discuss a proposition which he says is in the interest of fairness and justice without taking counsel of his bitter partisanship. [Applause.] The gentleman says he is not a partisan. I beg to differ with him. We are not always the best judges of the character we have in the estimation of our fellow-men. The gentleman from Illinois, in presenting a proposition which he says is in the interest of fairness and justice, has gone out of his way to excite prejudice against sections of this country. And he has not confined himself to the fact when he did it.

We may just as well talk plainly about this proposition. For the first time in our history we are invited to appoint three Committees on Election. Although there have been more contests heretofore than now, never before has such a suggestion been made. What is the purpose? Gentlemen say it is to give a fair and honest investigation of each case. What is there—I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the majority of this House—what is there in the history of the Republican party or in its practice respecting contested elections, to warrant us or anyone in believing that we shall have in this Congress a fair and impartial investigation of an election contest? Think about it, you older members! I suppose a new member coming to this Congress thinks—I know I did when I first came here—that inasmuch as the Constitution provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections of its members, that provision means something—that this House proposes to consider these questions as judges. But however individual members on the other side may desire to consider such questions, let me tell them now they will be swept away by the common sentiment on that side, and they will give in their adhesion to the principle that was announced, or is said to have been announced, many years ago in this House by a distinguished Republican. It was told of him that he came in when the House was about to vote on an election contest; he had not heard the argument, and had not read the report; and he inquired of somebody, "Which is our damned rascal? Which is our man?" And he voted for "our man."

Perhaps some of you gentlemen who are new to these Halls may think that this criticism of Republican practices is harsh. I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a part of the proceedings of the Fifty-first Congress to show how a Republican majority treats an election contest. I do not think we should assume that you are any better than your predecessors, and I will show you how that body treated an election contest. I could show you how the gentleman from Illinois in that body made a technical objection to a call for a division which was sought to show whether there was a quorum present.

This gentleman of a judicial cast of mind [laughter], this nonpartisan gentleman, cites the fact, as he says, that there are a large number of cases pending from the South and only five from the North. Does the gentleman know that there are only thirteen Democratic members from the North? Does he know that the five contests from the North are very largely more in proportion to the members from the North than the twenty-four from the South? Does he know that of the thirty-two pending contests every sitting member is a Democrat? Does he know that there were inaugurated forty-five contests in this Congress? The gentleman reads newspaper extracts. I have seen somewhere in some newspaper a statement that the Republican candidates everywhere were invited to make a contest when the majority against them did not exceed 1,000. They made these contests, they inaugurated forty-five in all, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, why should they not do so? Why should they not have inaugurated a hundred and three or a hundred and five contests, just as many as there are members on this side of the House?

But perhaps I had better have this Republican method of trying contested-election cases read to the House, so that gentlemen who are not familiar with the methods of the majority party in disposing of contested-election cases may see how that majority acted on a similar occasion when judging as to the merits of contested-election cases; and for that purpose I send to the desk, and ask to have read, parts of the proceedings of the Fifty-first Congress bearing directly on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

SOUTH CAROLINA ELECTION CONTEST—MILLER VS. ELLIOTT.

Mr. ROWELL. I call up the case of Miller vs. Elliott.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That William Elliott was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is not entitled to retain a seat therein.

"Resolved, That Thomas E. Miller was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-first Congress from the Seventh Congressional district of South Carolina, and is entitled to his seat as such Representative."

Mr. ROWELL. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. O'FERRALL. And upon that I raise the question of consideration.

The question was taken on consideration, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Division.

The House divided; and the Speaker announced that the ayes were 155.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point. There is a quorum present. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. Does 155 constitute a quorum of this House?

The SPEAKER. Not at all; but there are other members present besides those voting.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I say that no quorum has voted and no quorum is present, as disclosed by the vote.

Mr. MCCOMAS. There is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Some other gentlemen have come in since the vote was announced.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Fair play is fair play, and that is all I want of any man upon this question as to the consideration of this case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Does the Speaker decline to hear me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does. The gentleman is here for delay.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am not here for delay. This case has just been called up. [Derisive applause on the Republican side.] I have appeared before howling mobs before, and this does not deter me from standing here and demanding my rights. This case has been sprung upon this House without any notice whatever.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the previous question.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 154.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed will rise. [After a pause.] Gentlemen not voting will please rise.

Mr. CONGER. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Flood] did not vote.

The SPEAKER. Twelve not voting. One hundred and sixty-six members are present. So the previous question is ordered.

Mr. PAYSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. KERR of Iowa. Mr. Speaker—— [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KERR of Iowa. I understand that twenty minutes for debate are allowed. I would like to hear a statement of the reasons for the seating of this man.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not desire debate. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Republican side.] The report of the Committee on Elections has been printed.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolutions; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 156.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No quorum, Mr. Speaker, is either voting or present.

A MEMBER. One more in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 157, 1 no, and 9 not voting. So the resolutions are adopted.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

[Cries of "Next case!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. That is the way, Mr. Speaker, election cases were tried by the Republican party in the Fifty-first Congress. I venture the assertion that in all the history of parliamentary bodies everywhere throughout the world no case can be found where there was action taken by a deliberative body on an election contest to parallel this; and not only did these "judicial-minded" gentlemen dispose of the cases in that manner—not only did they dispose of a case involving the right of a member to a seat on this floor in five minutes, as the RECORD shows, but when they got through with that these judicial-minded gentlemen called out in chorus, "Next case!" "Next case!" [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, Mr. Speaker, if the cases had been upon the Calendar, so that they might have been reached, judging by the way they acted in that case, it is safe to assume that every member on this side of the House would have been excluded from the seat he occupied.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is it not a fact that it is unparalleled again in the history of legislative bodies, but which the RECORD does not show in the case to which he has alluded, that all the members of one party, in order to avoid being placed on record, should go out of the House and disorganize the House in the consideration of a contested-election case? And further, is it not true that if the members of the Democratic minority had been in their places consideration of the case could have proceeded in an orderly and proper manner? In other words, was it not a disorderly proceeding, in the language of the gentleman, simply because the Democratic party refused to perform their duty, in leaving the House in a body?

Mr. CRISP. Why, Mr. Speaker, a Republican member of the House, Mr. Kerr of Iowa, was not guilty of any disorder and did not leave the House, but he rose in his place and asked the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill, Mr. Rowell, to make some explanation of the case and show why Mr. ELLIOTT should be turned out, and Mr. Rowell said, "I do not desire to make any explanation." That was entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], I suppose. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] For I suppose that gentleman voted with his party and unseated Mr. ELLIOTT; and I will venture the assertion now that the gentleman from Massachusetts can not tell or give any reasons why he turned Mr. ELLIOTT out.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Are you willing that I should make a statement in reference to that case now?

Mr. CRISP. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts know the points involved?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I did at the time. They were public property in the House, in the reports of the Committee on Elections, which I examined.

Mr. CRISP. Did you read the reports?

Mr. WHEELER. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts read the report?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I did read the reports.

Mr. CRISP. Well, Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that the gentleman from Massachusetts is a very diligent member and attends to his business better than many of us. He read the report; but I will venture the assertion that nine-tenths of his associates on that side of the House did not.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will you yield to me for another question, and I will not again interrupt you? Is it not true that it had become a matter of custom in the Fifty-first Congress whenever election contests came up on this floor for the Democratic members to leave this Hall in a body for the purpose of breaking a quorum, and thereby prevent consideration and completion of the cases from first to last in that Congress; and is that not the reason the RECORD reads as it does?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, of course it is hardly worth while to revive the discussion that we had in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think it is unfortunate, but you have revived it. You are thrashing over the old straw of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. CRISP. I can remind the gentleman, and inform those gentlemen who are not acquainted with the facts, that in the Fifty-first Congress this body remained from the first Monday in December until the 29th day of January without any rules. We were being treated to general parliamentary law.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Are not the rules found in "general parliamentary law?"

Mr. CRISP. That general parliamentary law enabled the presiding officer to hold in order that which he desired to be in order and to hold out of order that which he did not want to consider. We went on in that condition until the 29th day of January, and then we had an election case. The Republican majority had not been made satisfactory by the people, and the House undertook to correct the mistake of the people and to make a Republican majority here. On the 29th day of January we had up an election contest without any rules. Without any authority, the presiding officer of the House counted men who did not vote, and we had an appeal to the House. It was extensively debated, and finally, by the vigorous exercise of the party whip, the Speaker was sustained in his decision, and then they made a rule authorizing the ascertaining of a quorum outside of the roll call. There was no authority on the part of the Speaker to count a quorum. Nobody on earth had authorized him to do any such thing, but he did it of his own will, and then, by the exercise of the party whip, his people were forced to sustain him or to present the spectacle of dividing from him or with him on a contested-election case, which that side has always treated as a party question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me one further question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I regret as much as you do that partisanship should have come into this question. I do not think it is necessary that there should be criminations and recriminations, but I want to ask you one question here now as a nonpartisan, which goes to the substance of the whole thing; do you claim that the treatment of election cases in this House in the last five Congresses has been any more prejudiced and unfair, and wanting in judicial accuracy and fairness, upon the part of the Republicans than upon the part of the Democrats?

Mr. CRISP. I do.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CRISP. I claim that there is not a case in the history of this Government, or the English Government, or the French or the German Governments, or any other where they have a parliamentary body, where a contested-election case on which the committee were divided, as they were in the case of Miller vs. Elliott, was conducted in the manner in which that case was conducted.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. What about the Joy case, from the State of Missouri, in the last Congress?

Mr. CRISP. But that case was debated, Mr. Speaker; it was here for a great length of time. This case that I speak of was not debated; and when a Republican asked the chairman of the Committee on Elections to give them some little reason for turning out Mr. ELLIOTT, that gentleman replied, "I do not want to debate," and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] did not want to debate, and he, with the rest of his party, voted to unseat Mr. ELLIOTT.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there anywhere in the history of contested-election cases in this country, other than in the Fifty-second Congress and possibly in the Fifty-third, a case where a partisan majority voted down a majority report of their own committee favoring the seating of the sitting member and turned him out and seated the contestant, who was a member of their own party?

Mr. CRISP. I do not know. I could not answer that. I have not looked.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not that probably an exhibition of partisanship greater than the mere absence of debate when there was nobody to debate except upon one side?

Mr. CRISP. No; the gentleman misapprehends this case. Where there has been full debate, or opportunity for debate, then of course each member can vote intelligently; but the criticism I make on this case is that there was no opportunity for debate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am speaking of the Joy case.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I am speaking of the case of Elliott versus Miller.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am aware of that, and if the gentleman had been present, as I was, he would know more about that case.

Mr. CRISP. I do not recollect the details, but my impression is that on the case which the gentleman mentions the Democrats divided. Some spoke for Mr. Joy and many voted for Mr. Joy; but in the case to which I refer, where the Republicans were compelled blindly to vote to turn out a Democrat, there was no division. They all voted to turn out that gentleman without knowing why.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment, I will state that my point is, that in the Joy case a committee of this House, constituted by Democratic authority, was either unanimous, or practically unanimous, in favor of the sitting member, and the longer the debate the more the light came; unfortunately the House voted, not blindly, but in my judgment wickedly, to turn Joy out.

Mr. CRISP. My information, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, is that the majority report was against Joy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Possibly it was.

Mr. CRISP. So that, perhaps, removes a little of the foundation of the argument of the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But certainly not so in the Rockwell case, and the Rockwell case is one of the cases to which I refer.

Mr. CRISP. My recollection about that is, although not very distinct, that Mr. O'Ferrall, the chairman of the committee, was in favor of the Republican.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly he was; and yet he was overturned by a partisan vote; and that after a debate, too.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman misapprehends the point I make, Mr. Speaker. That was overturned after debate and consideration. The point I make is that the Republican majority, without debate, without consideration, and without information, turned out a Democrat.

Mr. SETTLE. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. SETTLE. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a matter of common history that this district in South Carolina, over which this contest of Miller against ELLIOTT rose in the Fifty-first Congress, and which he has quoted in the discussion—I will ask him if in the apportionment of that State that district was not set aside expressly as a colored Republican district, having not less than 25,000 Republican majority, and if for two elections the Democratic party did not fail and refuse to nominate a candidate for Congress in that district, but kept faith, and after that, under the machinery, they did not then decide to take it away; and I will ask him, further, if these facts were not common knowledge, and thus made it too plain to have any discussion in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina—my friend from North Carolina—by his question has indicated and made plain the method and manner in which Republicans dispose of contested-election cases. "Common history; common rumor." That gentleman would take a census of any district in the South and find that so many were white people and so many were colored; and if the majority were colored he would say that is a Republican district, and he would presume if a Democrat came here he came by fraud; and he is not singular in that. That is the way with nearly all on that side.

Mr. SETTLE. The gentleman may make that as an argument, but as applied to me individually it is unjust.

Mr. CRISP. I would not be unjust to the gentleman—our side would not be. That gentleman was a spared monument in the last Congress. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] He had a contest here. A Democrat contested his seat, but he retained it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will ask the gentleman if he does not recollect that in ten out of the seventeen contests in the Fifty-first Congress the Democrat retained his seat?

Mr. CRISP. No; "the gentleman" does not recollect that. "The gentleman" recollects that there were seventeen contests in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should have said eight out of seventeen.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; well, in eight of these cases there were reports unseating Democrats, in four cases there were reports in favor of Democrats, and the others do not seem to have been disposed of. They may have been reported upon by the committee; I do not know.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But the gentleman does not deny that in eight out of seventeen cases the Democrat retained his seat?

Mr. CRISP. No; I think that is correct.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not true that of the nine you referred to, in the case in which Miller was seated and ELLIOTT unseated, that the Democratic members had withdrawn bodily from the Hall, leaving Governor O'Ferrall alone on guard, so that there was nobody to debate the question but the bare seats on that side of the House?

Mr. CRISP. But let me call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to this. Does the gentleman know of a gentleman named Kerr from Iowa? Mr. Kerr was a member from Iowa, and the gentleman must have known of him, as he is from his own State. He was a Republican. He said: "I understand that twenty minutes' debate are allowed. I would like to hear a statement of the reasons for the seating of this man." And he was right. The rules allowed twenty minutes, and Mr. Rowell said, "I do not desire debate." Rowell was chairman of the Committee on Elections, and the Republican side cried, "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. PAYNE. Of that time, thirty minutes, was not the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. O'Ferrall, the leading Democrat on the committee, entitled to occupy fifteen?

Mr. CRISP. He was, under the rule; but I think he was entitled also to some other things that he did not get here. He was entitled to a division on the preceding case, but he did not get it.

Mr. PAYNE. Keep to this case. Did Mr. O'Ferrall ask for fifteen minutes for debate on that case?

Mr. CRISP. A Republican asked for it.

Mr. PAYNE. But did Mr. O'Ferrall ask for it?

Mr. CRISP. No; but I suppose a Republican had a right to ask for some explanation of the case. The point I make is that your side does not want any explanation in such cases. All you want is to "vote, vote," when it is a question of turning out a Democrat and seating a Republican.

Mr. PAYNE. Our side had had an opportunity to read the report, and they understood the case. If Mr. O'Ferrall thought that they did not understand his side of the case, I suppose it was his duty to try to have it understood, and not merely to make delay.

Mr. CRISP. I infer from the remarks of the gentleman from New York that his side, when it is in the majority, reads only the majority report in a contested-election case. He says they had read the report on that side and understood the case. Now, my understanding is—the gentleman from New York may not be familiar with this idea—my understanding is that a judge ought to hear both sides.

Mr. PAYNE. I agree with the gentleman that a judge ought to hear both sides. I was one of the judges in that case. I understood the presentation of the case made in the report on the Republican side, and I had read the "views of the minority" on the Democratic side, but Mr. O'Ferrall seemed to be the only man representing the minority on the floor, and I was prepared to hear him for the fifteen minutes to which he was entitled, and it was his duty, if he supposed that our side did not understand the case, to occupy that fifteen minutes—unless he was left here by his colleagues simply for the purpose of prolonging the delay that had already gone on for a week in election cases. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Then the gentleman's idea is that because of something that this side of the House did his side was justified in blindly turning a Democrat out. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I do not care what this side did; you gentlemen had sworn to support the Constitution, and the Constitution told you that you should judge of the election of members of the House; but now the gentleman from New York says that because we on this side went out, therefore his side had a right to turn out Mr. ELLIOTT. That is his argument.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to my judicial friend from Maine. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope that while I put my question the gentleman from Georgia will maintain that same calm equipoise which characterized his service in the Chair. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman has referred to the Constitution. I want to ask him if in his judicial view the gentlemen on the other side were performing their duty under the Constitution when in a body they left their places in this Hall in order to obstruct the progress of public business? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I think so. I think the gentlemen on this side were justified in resisting by every method possible the outrage which was then being perpetrated by the Republican majority in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I will say to my friend from Maine, that the country seems to have entertained the same view, because at the next election they reversed your majority and gave us nearly 150 majority in the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the gentleman from Georgia seems to have forgotten that later than that, after the people of the country had seen the gentleman and his party make a countermarch and officially indorse the action that the Republicans had taken, the rules and the methods of procedure adopted in the Fifty-first Congress, declaring on this floor publicly by their vote that our course was absolutely essential to the transaction of public business—the gentleman, I say, forgets that after seeing that performance public sentiment, in its sober second thought, manifested itself in the personnel of this House of Representatives sitting here to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] And, Mr. Speaker, I know of no man who ought to realize the effect of the verdict of the American people in that controversy more fully and emphatically than the gentleman from Georgia himself. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I have a very high regard for my friend from Maine——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am glad to know it.

Mr. CRISP (continuing). But I have very little regard for his opinion on political questions. [Laughter.] I recollect having seen a statement, I do not remember where, to the effect that the gentleman from Maine thought that the Republican party had been indorsed in the last election by reason of his position on the Hawaiian question. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am very certain that the gentleman from Georgia has not been indorsed by reason of his position on the Hawaiian question. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. The older members here will recollect the performances of the gentleman from Maine on the Hawaiian question. They will recollect how he thundered in the index, how he proposed day after day to make a vigorous assault, and they will also recollect, when the opportunity was afforded him, how tame and flat and unprofitable it all was. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Unprofitable for the Democratic party of this country, I admit. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman's idea, no doubt, is that that speech destroyed the Democratic party. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Now, my friend from Maine—because he is my friend and I would not say anything to hurt his feelings—is a fair type of the judicial character of a Republican when he passes upon an election contest. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman has paid me the highest compliment that can be paid to any man in this country. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. If I could put my friend on the stand and ask him a question or two, I think I would like to do so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman does not know that I would be as comfortable a witness as he thinks I would.

Mr. CRISP. If I could put the gentleman on the stand and ask him a question or two, I think I could disclose that he never read the views of the majority and the minority in an election case in his life.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman certainly does not know anything about my condition in regard to those cases. He must be predicating his remark upon his own individual action. That is the only possible explanation I can put upon it.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, my objection to this proposition is——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will my friend, before he goes on, allow me a moment to say one word in regard to that Hawaiian matter? [Loud laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. I hope my friend will get time from some other gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only want about a minute.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the Speaker will recognize the gentleman from Maine, so that he may have an hour.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope he will.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. On the whole, I think perhaps I may get recognition. The experience of the past might cause me to have some doubt about it, if I did not recall the great change there has been in regard to free debate in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Maine is in the house of his friends, and I hope he will get recognition.

My objection, Mr. Speaker, to this proposition is that whatever may be the views of gentlemen presenting it the effect is going to be—I predict it now and I shall be delighted if my prediction does not come true—the effect of it is going to be to turn summarily out of this House a large number of gentlemen on this side without regard to the merits of their cases. I mean just what I say, and history justifies me in saying it. I cite to gentlemen a case in this House in the Fifty-first Congress that was determined—I can not say in how many minutes, probably five—without one word being said in explanation of the report; and although a Republican member asked the chairman or some member of the Committee on Elections to give some reason for unseating the gentleman who held the certificate of the governor of his State, they would not give him a reason, but they turned the Representative out.

My opinion is that this scheme will operate simply to make speedy judgment against members on this side of the House. Heretofore a man whose right to a seat was contested had the question considered by fifteen members. Now you propose that such questions shall be considered by nine members, the committee being broken up into "part 1," "part 2," "part 3." "Part 1" may have a view of the law which "part 2" may not share. "Part 3" may be composed of gentlemen who will give fair consideration to the evidence; "part 1" may not be. So that a man's right to a seat in the House will not so much depend upon the merits of his case as on the "part" of the committee to which the Speaker may refer it. "Part 1" may follow a State law; "part 2" may not. It may be said that the House will correct any such discrepancy. My reply is, judging of what the House did in the Fifty-first Congress, it does not correct anything, but accepts blindly what the committee does. Thus, as I say, you will have one branch of the committee reporting one view of the law, and another branch of it another view. And all this is for what? To railroad men on this side out of this House and seat Republicans.

But the gentleman says there is no temptation to do anything wrong. I have heard that suggestion. The reply is that the Republican party has never lost an opportunity, so far as I know, to seat its own members when it could get any plausible excuse for doing so. It has not always done it; but it has wherever a plausible excuse could be found. I have not looked up the cases, but I have some knowledge of them for the past ten or twelve years, and if time were allowed I could present them. But I do present this one case upon which I have already commented, and I ask gentlemen to explain it or reply to it if they can.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this proposition. I believe that these contests ought to be tried in an orderly manner; there has never before been a proposition to make three Election Committees. I do not see any advantage in such an arrangement except to make three chairmen and three clerks. It affords a good opportunity to provide for gentlemen by making additional chairmen and additional clerks. When you had a large number of contests before, they were decided by subcommittees of a single committee. Now you propose to have three Committees on Elections where heretofore you have had but one. You propose to have three chairmen, with three clerks at $2,000 each, and three committee rooms. I do not see any reason for this. The tendency ought to be to reduce rather than increase the committees of the House. I do not see that anything is to be accomplished by this proposition except it may be some partisan purpose. We ought to stand by the old method. I do not expect you to do it. I expect you to vote in this case as your predecessors did in voting to turn out ELLIOTT—vote as you are told to do. I want, however, to put on record my protest.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. HULICK. If we should have under this proposition an early determination of these election contests, would it not save large expense in the pay and mileage of the twenty-seven gentlemen who are contesting?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman assumes that we are going to turn out the men who are in and put in the others.

Mr. HULICK. I am only going on the assumption which the gentleman makes, that they will all be turned out, though I do not agree with him in that. I concur with him in the belief that there should be a careful adjudication of these matters; we should act understandingly and judicially. But would there not be a saving in the expenditure of public money by avoiding such delays in deciding these contests as there were in many cases in the last Congress?

Mr. CRISP. Well, I do not know about that. I have views myself about the expenses of a contestant in election cases. It was never intended by the law that as a matter of right a contestant should be allowed $2,000 for his contest. Wherever a man honestly believes that he has a good case for contest, then the law says he ought to be paid his expenses, not exceeding the sum of $2,000. The Committee on Elections ought to set an example as to this, and in those cases where a man has evidently no case on investigation by that committee no part of the expense should be allowed him.

Now, there are four cases—three or four—where the contests were inaugurated in this Congress and the contestant has taken no testimony. They have abandoned their cases. Certainly no allowance should be made in such cases.

Mr. HULICK. I agree with the gentleman in that respect.

Mr. CRISP. There were forty-five contests inaugurated in this House from all over the country, the Republican candidates being told that all they had to do was to appear and be seated. Forty-five cases, I am told, were begun.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow another question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. I want to make a suggestion on the political point, or partisan point, to which allusion has been made. The gentleman from Georgia assumes, if I understood him, and if I did not understand him correctly I hope he will set me right—he assumes that these contestants, the Republicans, will be seated and that the Democratic contestees will be unseated.

Mr. CRISP. No doubt, if a plausible excuse can be found.

Mr. HULICK. But I understood the gentleman to say that that action would be followed by the increased membership on his side of the House, the Democratic side, in future elections. That being the case, if that is the gentleman's conviction, then, from a partisan standpoint, does not the gentleman think he ought to favor this measure?

Mr. CRISP. I did not make any predictions about that.

Mr. HULICK. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP (continuing). Although I have no doubt it is true that such would be the result.

But I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the question of economy cuts very little figure in this matter; and I hope I will not be considered as offensive when I say that is, in my judgment, merely an excuse for the action proposed to be taken.

Now, sir, this Congress has been in session for more than two weeks. On the Speaker's table there is lying a message from the President of the United States involving a very important question, relating to Venezuela, and yet the Republican Congress can not take time to have read a matter of important and pressing public business, but must consume the time of the House with a mere partisan discussion inaugurated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. HULICK. Was not that "public business" to which the gentleman refers delayed by duck hunting down in North Carolina; and is it not true that the delay is in no wise due to the Congress of the United States? [Applause on the Republican side.] Have we had the opportunity to see that message until now?

Mr. CRISP. I can furnish it to the gentleman if he wants it. It is on the table, and it is a frank, open, manly defense of the Monroe doctrine, and when it is read I have no doubt my friend from Ohio will applaud it himself. But we can not read it—we can not do anything until we can induce this "judicial majority" to get away from the question of partisan politics long enough to take up important public matters.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can furnish the gentleman from Georgia with several copies, if he wishes me to do so, in advance of the reading from the desk.

Mr. CRISP. I have a copy and am glad my friend from Ohio has one. I would be glad to have it read from the desk, but I suppose there is no hope of anything of that kind, or of any patriotic business being transacted until you get through with your partisan propositions.

I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in my own time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] presented to the House to-day a resolution which proposes, in the first place, to increase the number of members of certain committees of the House, and in the second place to appoint three Committees on Elections instead of one as heretofore. So far as the first proposition is concerned, it simply follows the precedent established by the two preceding Congresses, and that proposition has been already accepted by the House without a dissenting voice. The only question now before the House is ought we to have three Elections Committees instead of one, and with reference to that particular question I am unable to see, sir, how any partisanship can possibly be connected therewith or in any manner involved.

I am unable to see where the line should be drawn between the gentleman on that side of the Chamber and the gentleman on this side of the Chamber in the consideration of that question. There are some things about which we can not possibly have any controversy. There can be no possible dissent to the proposition that the highest function of this House and its most imperative duty are to determine its own membership. The Constitution of the United States makes this House—unwisely, I think—the ultimate judge of the election and qualifications of its own members, and the very first question that meets us on the threshold of an incoming Congress is the question who constitutes the House of Representatives as chosen by the people of the United States. No man who has not been legally chosen has any right to sit in this House for a single moment beyond the time when, by the exercise of the utmost expedition, the House of Representatives shall have had an opportunity to pass upon his title. No man entitled to his seat in this House, no man rightfully holding the commission of his people, has any right to be hanging around the doors of these Halls or loitering on the floor of this House with his title undetermined a single moment longer than when the House, by the exercise of the utmost expedition, shall have had the opportunity to pass upon that title. [Applause on the Republican side.] Those are propositions to which all gentlemen here will assent. Justice to the contestant, justice to the contestee, justice to the people that they respectively represent, demand at the hands of this House an impartial and early determination of all questions as to membership.

There are some incidental matters—some matters outside of these—that pertain to our duty that ought also to influence us. This crowded Chamber, with scarcely room enough for the members who rightfully occupy it, ought not to have on its floor, as it has now every day, 30 additional interested parties. We ought not to be put in the possible situation of paying out of the National Treasury, now largely depleted, salaries to two gentlemen, both claiming to represent the same Congressional district.

You will agree with me, therefore, I think, whatever may have been the merits or demerits of the Fifty-first Congress, that a duty stares us in the face demanding immediate performance.

Now, let me ask what is our situation with respect to the performance of that duty? There are, let us say, thirty election contests pending. I think the precise number is thirty-four, but some three or four will be disposed of without real contests. There are, we will say, in round numbers, thirty contests, which you will agree with me we ought to determine as expeditiously as possible. The records in those thirty contests make 15,627 pages of text of the sort which I hold in my hand. My friend in front of me [Mr. HEPBURN] made a calculation, which he was kind enough to furnish to me, and I find that, assigning 8 pages of those records for perusal by the members of an election committee to an hour—which certainly is as much as any man can read carefully in an hour—it would take nineteen hundred and fifty-three hours to read the bare records in these cases, and it would take, at eight hours a day, which I think is a tolerably good day's work, especially at work of this sort—it would take a member of that committee two hundred and forty-four days to read simply the records in these thirty contested-election cases. In addition to that, these cases must be heard. Counsel upon both sides are entitled to be heard. These cases must then be discussed in committee, reports must be written, and the cases brought in and put on the Calendar of the House.

Now, I ask you the question, do you believe it possible that justice can be done in these thirty cases by a single Election Committee? Why, any man who will throw aside his partisanship—and I renew what I said at the outset, I am unable to comprehend how partisanship should enter into the determination of this question at all—any man who will throw aside his partisanship and look this matter fairly in the face will agree with me that something must be done. Something must be done, and what? Can you gentlemen suggest any better arrangement than the arrangement that is suggested in this resolution? I venture to say for the membership on this side of the Chamber that we are not hidebound about this matter. We want to attain a result. We are willing to accept any proposition that looks to the attainment of that result. Have you any other proposition to offer? Has the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who so exhaustively discussed the Fifty-first Congress, and so exhaustively neglected the question before the House—has he any proposition to advance? Now, what are we to do?

This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that a question of this character has faced the House of Representatives. In the Forty-first Congress, as my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] advised you, there were some thirty-five election contests. The Committee on Elections, fifteen in number, was subdivided into five sections, and, by a rule adopted by the House, each of these subdivisions was authorized to report directly to the House of Representatives. That method had the indorsement of such distinguished men as General Garfield on this side of the Chamber and S. S. Cox on the other side of the Chamber. Do you want to adopt that method? Why, gentlemen, that was simply having five election committees, constituted of three members each, and the contestant and contestee came with their cases into this House without the judgment of the committee as a whole. It seems to us, in the discussion of this question, that that is objectionable; that all the parties to the contest are entitled to have not only the judgment of a subcommittee in the first instance, but the judgment of the whole committee, to be revised by the judgment of this House; and so we do not advocate that method. In the Forty-sixth Congress Mr. MILLS, now Senator MILLS, a member of that House, suggested that each election contest should be sent to an independent committee, each committee, of course, dealing with only one contest. He proposed that that committee should be small in numbers, and the same objection, therefore, lies to that proposition that lies to the method adopted in the Forty-first Congress.

If, then, we have a difficulty to meet, and there is no way pointed out by experience of meeting it, why not adopt the suggestion made—that we shall have three independent committees, coordinate in authority, each of which shall act as a judicial body and pass upon these contests?

Now, I do not intend to be led into any discussion as to the character of election committees. I do not believe that all virtue, knowledge, and law belong on the Democratic side of this House; nor do I believe, either, that they belong on this side of the House. The objection made by the gentleman from Georgia to what is proposed is, first, that this will work an injustice to parties to election contests. Well, if the gentleman assumes, as he has no right to assume, that this side of the House is going unjustly to determine as to the titles of those parties to contests, I submit to him that upon that single proposition the honor and dignity and convenience of the House demand that that decision shall be made right away. Every motive to convenience demands that if these gentlemen are to be turned out, as assumed by the gentleman from Georgia, they shall be turned out promptly, and that can only be done by three committees instead of by one.

I will not follow the gentleman into his partisan discussion of this question any further than to say that so far as the Miller and Elliott case is concerned, no Democrat in the Fifty-first Congress who honestly examined that case ever believed for a single solitary moment that Colonel ELLIOTT had any title, even the remotest, to the seat he occupied, and none of them so voted. Why, when the case of Miller and Elliott was called up, and when Colonel ELLIOTT ought to have been backed by the entire Democratic side of the House in his demand for justice, there was not a single solitary Democrat on this floor, except Governor O'Ferrall, and his aim and purpose at that time in being here was to prevent this House from performing its constitutional functions.

Now, what else does the gentleman say? His only argument that I recollect against this proposition to hasten the determination of these election contests is this: He says it is not in the interest of economy; that we would have to have three clerks. Why, not at all. There is no necessity for three clerks. One clerk can perform the necessary functions for all three committees. He says we would have to have another committee room. Why, not at all. One committee room will accommodate three election committees and leave it unoccupied still three days in the week. So, not to impose longer in an argument of what seems to me so plain a proposition, I submit to you, first, that the imperative duty rests upon us to determine these contests; second, that they should be determined speedily, and that no other method has been suggested than this method, which is a reasonable one, in the interest of justice, of economy, and attention to the public business.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, representing as I do, in part, the city of New York, and the city of New York being interested in two of the election contests, I will venture to address the House for a few minutes from the standpoint of a lawyer.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says there is no partisan question involved, and yet at the same time proclaims that it is the bounden duty of the majority to take some of the few seats remaining to this side of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that it is a purely academic question; that it is a question entirely divorced from party politics and partisanship.

Now, I believe, and in that I am in accord with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the provision contained in the fifth section of the first article of the Federal Constitution, that each House shall be the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members, is a very unwise provision; and it is about the only unwise provision which can be found in that immortal instrument. The reason why it is wrong is that it allows the House of Representatives to go back of the returns, and to inquire into the motives alleged to have been entertained by the elector. It allows the House of Representatives to declare a ballot cast by one man was in reality intended for another man; that when a citizen votes for James Smith his vote shall be counted in favor of Joseph Smith. These are instances which show the lack of wisdom in that provision of the Federal Constitution. But still so it remains.

Now, what is the proposition? If we regard this purely from an academic standpoint, I am unable to see any argument in its favor. But one argument thus far has been urged. We have had a great deal of discussion as to the conduct of election contests in previous Congresses. We have heard a great deal said by the gentlemen on the other side of the House as to the conduct of the majority of the different political parties in the history of this country, but I have listened in vain to hear one argument urged why this change should be adopted. There is only one argument that has thus far been adduced, and that is, the need of haste. The proposition is advanced that the majority, the overwhelming majority, should make haste to take some seats away from the Democratic party.

Now, I say to you gentlemen on that side, stop; think well before you hasten to deprive us of seats to which we are entitled. If I were prominent on the other side of the House and could dictate, as your leaders doubtless can, the true policy of your party, I should urge upon you one and all to make haste slowly in this matter. Do not change the existing procedure or law. Has it not worked well enough in the past? Why should it be changed now, when you come in under the banner of victory? Would any such proposition have found favor on your side of the House during the Fifty-third Congress? I for one am in favor of absolute fair play in every election case. I do not think that any election case should be decided from a partisan standpoint, and I refer to my record in the last Congress to show that my vote was cast, on at least one occasion, for the Republican contestee. And I think that principle should be observed by all the members on either side of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, human nature is so constituted that it is absolutely impossible in any large representative body to have election cases considered with strict judicial fairness, so it must be presumed that you will take from us just as many of these seats as you may decide to deprive us of, no more and no less. It seems to me, gentlemen, that there are two good reasons why this proposed change should not be made. We have had in the past committees on elections consisting of 13 or 15 members, and now, under the pending proposition, we are to have three committees consisting of 9 members each. The first objection to this change is that all delegated power is in itself objectionable, and therefore no body should deliberately go to work to lessen the number of the members of the body to whom power is to be delegated. If you have a committee on elections consisting of 15 members and you abridge or lessen its membership to 9, it is manifest that every man whose seat is contested is deprived of a valuable right. When he was elected a Representative in Congress he had a right to assume that the Committee on Elections before whom, if his seat was contested, the contest would be brought would consist of as large a number of members as it had consisted of up to the present time. No man could have imagined that when the Republican party came into power here it would proceed at once, in pursuance of a desire for undue haste, to lessen or to cut up the Committee on Elections.

There is another objection, and that is, that our whole system of procedure is here proposed to be changed. It is well known that the Committee on Elections is one of the great committees of this House, and it is now proposed by gentlemen on the other side to cut up that committee so as to have three Elections Committees of coincident and concurrent jurisdiction. We now have a court consisting of fifteen members, instead of which it is proposed to have three courts, or three parts of one court, consisting of nine members each. That proposition is at variance with the system which obtains in the House of Representatives with reference to the consideration of every other subject. Why not have three Committees on Foreign Affairs? Why not refer to one of those subcommittees or parts of the committee the question of the Alaskan boundary, to another the Venezuelan question, and to a third the question of the recognition of the belligerent rights of Cuba?

This illustration fairly shows the absurdity of the proposed change unless there be something in the argument of haste. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] tells us that it is absolutely impossible for all the fifteen members of the Committee on Elections to read the records in these election cases. He says it would be necessary that a man should sit down for two hundred and forty-four days, and that that would be impossible, and for this reason he proposes to divide up the work. I see no force in that argument. That argument merely serves to bring out the fact that only a few members of this House on the other side—and your votes are important, gentlemen on the other side, because these contests are to be determined by your votes and not by ours—this argument, I say, simply serves to bring out the fact that it will be impossible for more than a comparatively small number of the 250 members on the Republican side of the House to read the records in these contested-election cases, although they will all be called upon to vote on them.

This alone shows that the procedure can not be like that of a judicial tribunal. It can not be a fair court for the trial of these issues of fact. It is a court clothed with extraordinary powers, a court not of law, but also of equity, or alleged equity; a court with power to go back of the returns and to decide each contested case just as suits the pleasure of the majority. And yet one of the leaders on the Republican side tells us to-day that it is impossible for members to read the statements of facts, although those statements are the only basis upon which judgment should be rendered. I say, then, in view of this fact, gentlemen of the majority, for your own sakes and for the sake of your party, you ought not to change any preexisting rule or law in regard to this matter of determining contested-election cases. It is not only in the interest of gentlemen on this side of the House, but it is in the interest of your own side, it is in the interest of the whole country, that we should stick to the old system of procedure. Is it so necessary that you should add thirty or thirty-two more Representatives to your long roll on that side of the House?

I for one believe that when we come to the question of feasibility or practicability it will be found perfectly easy for a Committee on Elections consisting of thirteen or fifteen members to read all the evidence and to decide these cases within a reasonable time. Was there any undue zeal for speed shown on this side of the House in the Fifty-third Congress? Did we dispose hurriedly or unfairly of the North Carolina case of the gentleman who has spoken to-day, Mr. SETTLE? Did we not virtually decide that case in his favor without pressing it to the test of a vote? Did we not delay, day after day, week after week, the consideration of other election cases? Did any leader on our side rise up and say that it was essential to have haste in those matters, that it was objectionable to have extra Representatives or alleged Representatives walking around this Hall, and that for that reason the Calendar must be cleared and more Democrats must take their seats in this House?

I appeal to you, gentlemen, in common fairness, was not the course of the Democratic majority in the Fifty-third Congress honorable and fair? Did you not often find members on this side of the House casting their votes in favor of Republicans when the seats of those Republicans were contested by Democrats? Was there not throughout the whole of that Congress a fair spirit shown by the majority? I think the record bears me out in the statement that such was the course of our party in that Congress. But, leaving that question aside, why is not some strong and salient reason given for the proposed change? Haste appears to be the only object. There are thirty-two of these contested-election cases in all. The record in thirty of them has been filed in the Clerk's office. The papers are printed, and I know that with only a fair amount of industry I could in two or three days read the whole of the record in any one of those cases, and I believe that any gentleman on the Committee on Elections, if it is to consist of thirteen, or fifteen, or seventeen members, can very readily master all the statements of fact in any given case, and if he be a lawyer, all the law applicable to such a state of facts, within a very short time, probably long before this House in the ordinary course of business will be ready to take up for consideration any contested-election case on the Calendar.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I confess I always enjoy seeing the monotony of the proceedings of this House enlivened by a flash of humor, but I could not but feel during the earlier part of this debate that a little too much merriment was being indulged in, considering the importance of the question under discussion; nor could I avoid thinking that crimination and recrimination from a partisan standpoint were somewhat aside the real question which we are called upon to discuss and determine. I was, therefore, glad when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] brought the debate into what I conceived to be a proper channel, and discussed the pending proposition upon the high ground on which I think it ought to be discussed and decided by this body.

Mr. Speaker, the right of a member to his seat in a legislative body is a question of the highest parliamentary privilege. Indeed, there can scarcely come before a legislative body a question of higher privilege than this. This proposition, I undertake to say, is laid down in every reputable work on parliamentary law that has ever been written. A question of this kind is therefore one which this body should promptly meet at the very threshold if it can possibly do so, and dispose of it before passing to the enactment of legislation.

The fact that the name of a man appears on the roll of this House is merely prima facie evidence that he has been duly elected and is entitled to a seat in this body. Examination may show—indeed, examination frequently does show—that he is not entitled to a seat and ought to be turned out, in order that the Representative that really was elected may be installed in his place.

Mr. Speaker, this parliamentary privilege is an important thing—not only to parties who may contest here for a seat, but also to the people. It is important to the member who, being rightfully elected, is wrongfully kept out of his seat, to the end that he may promptly come into the possession of the heritage which is his own. It is important to the people, to the end that the sitting member, if he is not rightfully elected, shall yield up that which does not properly belong to him. It is important to the people, to the end that at the earliest possible moment they may be represented in this legislative body by the man whom they have elected, who bears their true commission, and whom they desire shall represent them. Particularly in a government constituted as ours—a government in which the people are the source of all power—a government which is representative in its character is this parliamentary privilege to which I have adverted of the highest significance and value.

Now, I think it will be agreed, Mr. Speaker, by all members who have given the subject anything more than a purely superficial examination, that the old method of determining the right of a member to his seat through the medium of simply one committee consisting of fifteen members can not possibly do justice in the condition of affairs in which this House now finds itself. The bare statement of statistics made by the distinguished gentleman who opened this debate shows the absolute impossibility of this committee being able to determine during the lifetime of the present Congress the thirty-two election contests which are pending before it. Any member who has had experience as a member of the Committee on Elections—aye, any member who has had anything like a reasonable experience in this House—knows that such a thing is entirely unattainable.

Why, sir, Congress after Congress, in which there has been pending only one-half the number of contested elections that we now have pending before this House, has adjourned without all the election contests having been passed upon. If, then, the old, or rather the present, method is not sufficient, what is the plain duty of this House? It is to obey the constitutional provision, which is couched in imperative and not in permissive language, that "the House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." I am frank to confess, Mr. Speaker, that in common with other gentlemen I lament the practice, which has prevailed in Congress from time immemorial, of permitting passion to take the place of reason and prejudice to take the place of justice in the discussion and decision of these questions of contested elections.

I wish it were possible to refer these matters to some outside, some judicial, tribunal which could pass on them impartially in the first instance, and, after such a careful examination of the facts and the law, refer them back to Congress, to the end that Congress, with such decision before it, might come to a correct and final conclusion in the cases. But in the necessity which confronts us it is impossible to devise a complete remedy. For the time being we must meet this emergency as best we may. We are not without precedent, sir, for the action here proposed. The Forty-first Congress, as has been pointed out, devised a system whereby it sought to accelerate the hearing of contested-election cases when it was in much the same dilemma as is now present here.

While I approve, generally, of the system then adopted, I do not approve of the provision in that system which required the chairman of the Committee on Elections to refer individual cases coming before it to three members constituting a subcommittee and giving them the exclusive right to consider such cases and the right to report directly to the House. In this particular I confess that I think the rule adopted by the Forty-first Congress was wrong. I believe that every man who has a contested-election case pending here is entitled to have it receive the careful consideration of the entire Elections Committee. The proposed rule now pending will, if adopted, cause this very thing to be done. I am here to advocate it as being in every respect superior to the precedent which we have been invited here to follow.

One other consideration in this matter: The adoption of the pending proposition will save expense. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] tells us that he does not think economy cuts any figure in this matter. This is in the nature of a departure for the gentleman. He was not talking that way when he was inveighing against what he was pleased to style the extravagant appropriations of "the billion-dollar Congress." He was not talking that way when his own party in this House was passing niggardly appropriation bills which were crippling the administration of the Government in its most vital parts. He was not talking this way when his own party was in power, and was, under the inspiration of false economic theories, passing a revenue bill which has since created only a deficit. But the truth about the matter is that it will be a great saving of public expense. Add up the amount that it will cost for an extra clerk to each committee, if you please, and then compare it with the amount of money that will necessarily be saved by an honest and lawful decision of these contested cases, in which sitting members who are not entitled to their seats will be ousted from them, as they ought to be, at an early day, and then observe, if you please, the saving of money that will be accomplished, and you will find at once that this pending proposition is not only right in principle, but is also in the interest of a just and proper economy.

Why is it that gentlemen oppose the adoption of this proposed rule? Why do they offer objections to it? They should remember that it is not the mere manual possession of a seat upon this floor that gives honor. It is rather the honesty of its acquisition, and the integrity and ability with which it is filled. They should remember that there is a broad distinction between the man who comes into this House crawling through the sewer, bespattered with mud, reaching out his avaricious and dishonest hands to seize that which properly belongs to another, and the man who enters that door clothed with the livery of the public service, confident in the possession of the title which the people have voluntarily conferred upon him.

Every moment, sir, that a member who is not rightfully elected is allowed to sit on this floor it is an insult to the members of this House and a wrong done to the people. Such a member never can expect to rise to usefulness, or even to influence, in this body. His very presence here is a reproach to the members who surround him and a contagion to the atmosphere in which they dwell.

Mr. Speaker, no gentleman who is conscious that his title is invulnerable need object to the passage of this proposed rule. Nobody is going to do anyone injustice, I apprehend, upon this floor.

Gentlemen who imagine that harm is to result from the adoption of this rule seem to think there is something in the past precedents of their party which will justify retaliation here. They appear to dread danger in the carrying out of the adage "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." They seem to forget that the doctrine of retaliation is founded in barbarism and is a base and unworthy one, and is not likely to find lodgment on this side of the Chamber. I have sufficient confidence, sir, in the majority on this floor to believe that not a single member will be mean and vindictive enough to be guided by it. I believe that they are all inspired by a sincere desire to let bygones be bygones and to decide these contested-election cases on the law and on their merits. If there has ever been a time in the history of the American Congress when contested-election cases could not be fairly decided, let us rather exult that the opportunity now offers when we may abandon that line of conduct, and when we may establish a new precedent which will justly be followed in all future Congresses.

This opportunity presents itself to this Republican majority now. Neither a due regard for principle nor party policy can be subserved here by the commission of wrong. I think I know something of the temper of the Republicans upon this floor. I think I can safely say—and I assume to speak principally for myself—that there will not be a solitary man who is really entitled to a seat upon this floor, no difference what is his political affiliation, no difference from what section of the country he hails, who will not be confirmed in his seat, whether he presents himself at the doors of this House with a good title in his hand, or whether he is already, by invulnerable title, placed upon this roll of the body.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to advert briefly to some things that were said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] before he took his seat, and then I will no longer trespass upon the attention of the House. He has asked what there is in the record of the Republican party to justify the belief that it will be fair. If the gentleman asks that question simply in the nature of an exclamation, by way of rhetorical flourish, then I have nothing to say. If, however, he asks it seriously, I can only say that in so doing he pays but a meager tribute to his own intelligence, and that if he will read the history of his country carefully he will be able, in the light of Republican manliness and fidelity there disclosed, to obtain an ample and satisfactory reply.

All the arguments that have been made, Mr. Speaker, on that side of the Chamber concerning the question under discussion savor of apprehension, and may justly be characterized as arguments by way of anticipation. They are all based on the presumption that a wrong is to be committed; and we are told by the gentleman from Georgia that this House will be swept away by a common sentiment of injustice in the decision of contested-election cases. The position of the gentleman from Georgia is simply this: The Constitution requires—and it is imperative—that the House shall judge and determine of the qualifications and election of its members. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says it shall not perform this constitutional mandate, but that it ought to resolve itself into a do-nothing Congress in election contests for fear that it will go astray if it undertakes to perform its duties at all. The gentleman, too, was somewhat unfortunate in his reference to the contested-election case of Miller vs. Elliott, in the Fifty-first Congress. The doing of this at once calls up reminiscences which reflect no credit upon the gentleman's party.

I was not here during the session of the Fifty-first Congress, Mr. Speaker, and can not speak of the details of that contest; but I remember that in the Fifty-second Congress Mr. Miller again appeared and again brought a contest against Mr. ELLIOTT for that seat. I remember that in the committee that case was put by the majority at the foot of the docket, instead of being put in its proper place there for hearing. I remember that gentlemen upon that committee who belonged to the majority persistently absented themselves from the committee room in order to prevent a quorum and prevent that case from being considered and reported. I remember that by this dilatory policy this man Miller, who was clearly entitled to his seat, who was plainly proven to be entitled to it, was not even allowed a hearing, and that, although there were only six contested-election cases before the Elections Committee, they permitted that Congress to expire without even allowing his case to be brought to the attention of the House.

I remember that I myself, urging the case forward to the best of my humble ability on the part of the minority, to the end that the man might have simply a hearing before the House, succeeded in getting from that body an order for the printing of the report of the minority of the committee, whereupon the majority were compelled to report, and I remember, too, that in the last and expiring moments of that Congress I myself sought to call up on the floor of the House this case of Mr. Miller, and demanded that a hearing should be given to it; and that these gentlemen who have been prating to-day about the wrongful actions of the Fifty-first Congress in contested-election cases raised the question of consideration against it, and would not even allow the man so clearly elected an opportunity to be heard or to have his case decided upon.

We are also told, Mr. Speaker, by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that this scheme of having three Elections Committees is objectionable, because one committee may take one view of a legal question and another committee may take another view of that same question; and then the gentleman proceeded to answer himself immediately afterwards when he admitted that the whole case after all finally rested in the power of the House. Why, the House will have, of course, plenary power and control over the various Elections Committees. The House may adopt or reject the reasoning of any of them. It may adopt the report of one committee and reject the report of another committee, or it may finally refer the whole case back to the Committee on Contested Elections for further action. There is no danger, however these committees may differ in their views of the law, but that when the House has all these cases before it in their proper order it will be able to preserve its consistency and do absolute justice in each one of them.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] further informs the House that there were thirty-five contests for seats commenced in this Congress, but that four or five of them have been abandoned. That is simply for the reason that those of our own political household who instituted these contests knew our sentiments better than does the gentleman from Georgia, and they felt sure that a contest without merits would meet with no consideration at the hands of their party friends in this House. I prefer to take the opinion of these men, with their superior sources of knowledge, as to the feeling of the Republican majority on the subject of election cases than to take the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], whom I hope it will not be thought I deal unjustly by when I say that from the beginning to the end of what he has said in this debate he never rose to the dignity of an argument, but has spent his entire time mainly in predicting misconduct upon the part of this majority, which he has no reasonable grounds to believe will ever occur.

Mr. Speaker, the hindsight of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will no doubt be more just to the motives and conduct of this House than his foresight. I am sure that if he will await the impartial action of this body his retrospect will be more accurate and just than the forecasts which he has made.

Mr. Speaker, the question before us is a plain and simple one. I need not delay the House longer in the presentation of it. It resolves itself in a very simple proposition, which is this: All previous experience has shown that no House constituted as this is, with a single Elections Committee of fifteen men, can possibly dispose of one-third the number of contested-election cases that are before us for its consideration.

The mandate of the Constitution is plain. It is an imperative duty, from which the House can not escape if it would, that it shall judge of the qualifications and election of its own members.

As has been said, gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber have contented themselves with predicting evil and have not been able to suggest a single method of relief for the difficulty by which we are confronted. There are proposed in the pending measure three separate committees, constituted not to work injustice, but to do justice; constituted to do justice to the contestant and contestee; constituted to do justice to the people from whom these parties came; and until gentlemen can offer some better argument against the adoption of this rule than a mere pessimistic prophecy as to what will be its results, until they can come forward and offer some tangible substitute to take its place, it were better that they remain silent and let the majority of this House take upon its shoulders, as it is ready to do, the responsibility and the honor of adopting a rule which will dispose of these cases speedily and without delay, and which I hope and believe will do away with party considerations in the matter of contested elections before the American House of Representatives, leaving such cases to be determined solely upon the law and the facts, regardless of the political complexion of any gentleman who comes before a committee or before this House to invoke its investigation and its action. [Applause on the Republican side and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the gentleman from Georgia desires to use any more of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia does not seem to be in his seat at present.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois, while he is waiting for the return of the gentleman from Georgia, permit me to ask him if he would have any objection to amending his motion by providing that the members of these Elections Committees shall be required to take a special oath?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, touching that matter, that long since I have come to the conclusion that the commandments "Thou shalt not bear false witness" and "Thou shalt not lie" come from the same source; and practicing law, as I have done for many years, I have come to the conclusion that when you find a man who will tell a lie when the truth is called for, he will not hesitate to swear to it. I do not much believe in special oaths myself, and do not think they amount to anything.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, we will make him swear to a lie; then he will be punished hereafter. [Laughter.]

The suggestion I have made was with the utmost good faith. I understand the purpose the gentleman has in view (and I am entirely in sympathy with it) is to secure speedy and impartial determination of these contested-election cases. I fully agree with the idea that when a man has once taken an oath in this House he ought to feel called on, in all his relations with the House, to conform to the obligations of that oath. But the statement is made on both sides of the House and not contradicted—the gentleman from Illinois made the statement himself—that the members of this House and the members of the Committee on Elections have not been controlled in these cases by their general oath; and if they have not done so heretofore, I do not see any reason to believe that they will hereafter.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any reason why a member of the House, who happens to become a member of any special committee, should take an oath different from or any more binding than that which the other individual members of the House take when they assume their duties on this floor? And in the second place, let me ask the gentleman, if such an oath should be prescribed by the House as he suggests, would it not become an extrajudicial oath? Would not the only authority competent to prescribe such an oath be the authority that can enact a law?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. Does not the House very frequently authorize its committee to administer oaths, and are they not binding?

Mr. PAYNE. But that is done in pursuance of law.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). I take the distinction to be this: That all other committees of the House deal with various questions. This committee alone deals with the one single question of determining the right of the members to their seats on this floor. The admission has been universally made that in the past these cases have been tried on their politics and not upon their merits. Now, if we are trying to devise a way to decide these cases on their merits and not upon their politics, let us make it as binding as possible.

Mr. PAYNE. The Constitution imposes this duty on each member of the House, to be a judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of each of the other members. We also take an oath to perform our duties as members of the House under the Constitution. Does the gentleman from Texas think that any judicial oath, such as a judge or a jury would take, could impose any additional responsibility or add any moral obligation to that already imposed on the members of the House by the Constitution? And that a man who would not perform his duty faithfully and well under the oath already prescribed, and that he has already taken, would deal more fairly with his fellow-members or perform his duties any better under any additional form of oath that may be devised?

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to say that I think the gentleman from New York would perform the duties of his office without any oath at all; and yet he is required by the law to take the oath before he is entitled to a seat on this floor, and I think it a very sensible provision. I do not doubt either that many members of the House would discharge the duties and responsibilities of the Elections Committee without any special form of oath. But many of them do not, and it can do no possible harm to guard this matter so as to accomplish as nearly as we can the object the gentleman from Illinois claims to have in view.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What sort of an oath would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. BAILEY. I will obligate myself to prepare one that will be entirely acceptable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we have already taken one oath to perform our duty faithfully under the Constitution and the law. In the House and in the committee we investigate this matter. We are the court of last resort.

Mr. BAILEY. And I want to swear them as judges.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think they will discharge their duties faithfully.

Mr. BAILEY. But the admission is that they have not done so.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the oath we have already taken does not bind them, they have no conscience.

Mr. BAILEY. The way cases have been decided it does not seem to have bound them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then you should resort to some medicine more drastic than two oaths—something that would blister.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he has exhausted his time and desires more?

Mr. CRISP. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he desires more time. I want to take the floor, but I do not want to cut the gentleman off.

Mr. CRISP. What time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes left.

Mr. CRISP. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like a little more if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that all the members on that side of the House feel, as they express themselves, determined to consider all the election cases in a fair and judicial manner; but we must remember that the experience of this country shows that when bodies like this come into the excitement of contests they are liable to forget these very virtuous resolutions. When the Forty-seventh Congress met I believe every member on the Republican side of the House came here with just as virtuous intentions as the gentlemen have who came and took their seats in this Hall on the 2d of this month; but when excitement ruled high there were certain things which transpired in that House which can very properly be referred to in this debate, especially as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], who has just taken his seat, appealed to the history of the Republican party in matters of this character as a refutation of this charge that in election cases they had been partisan rather than judicial. I have before me the evidence in the case of Mackey vs. O'Connor, Mackey being the Republican and O'Connor the Democrat.

After the contest commenced O'Connor died, and Mr. Dibble, a Democrat, was elected without opposition. When Congress met the Republican side insisted upon considering the case, substituting Dibble for O'Connor. As the case proceeded the following remarkable facts were developed: Undenied proof was brought before this House that after O'Connor's death Mr. Mackey, the contestant, took the testimony in that case, very largely rewrote it, burned up much of the original evidence, and materially changed a great part of the balance, and after holding this evidence some eleven months in his possession he sent it to this House, had it printed, and went before the committee insisting that he should have his seat, basing his claim upon the testimony which, before the case was considered, was proven to be false and forged and not the evidence which was taken under the oath of the witnesses.

In the face of undenied proof that Mr. Mackey falsified and forged the evidence, the House declined to even consider the question of the false and forged character of the evidence, but proceeded to act upon the testimony, and upon such false and forged evidence unseated Mr. Dibble and seated Mr. Mackey. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read evidence sustaining what I charge, and I first ask that the affidavit of Mr. C. Smith, on page 4384, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Dibble also presented the affidavit of C. Smith, of South Carolina, corroborating the statement made by Mr. Dibble. This affidavit is as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, Charleston County:

Before me personally came C. Smith, in response to a summons to testify as to certain matters in a contest entitled E. W. M. Mackey v. M. P. O'Connor, and who, being duly sworn, says: "I was employed by E. W. M. Mackey to write out the testimony taken in his behalf in the contest between himself and Mr. O'Connor for a seat in the Forty-seventh Congress; this writing was done at the house of Colonel Mackey, and at the United States court-house, and at my room. The body of testimony was in the handwriting of E. H. Hogarth, stenographer and notary public, and there were interlineations, erasures, and portions of the original sheets were cut out and other sheets substituted, and sometimes left out entirely; that sometimes nearly a whole page was struck out by drawing a line across it; that the interlineations were in the handwriting of E. W. M. Mackey; that the copy made by me omitted the erasures and inserted the interlineations; that sometimes whole pages of this testimony in the handwriting of Col. E. W. M. Mackey would be inserted, and of which there was no original in the handwriting of Mr. Hogarth, the notary public, that I saw; that sometimes when I returned the originals and my copy of the same, Colonel Mackey destroyed the originals by placing them in a stove, or destroying them by tearing them up; that in some instances the copy made by me was returned interlined, and I made fresh copy with such corrections; the interlineations last mentioned were also in the handwriting of Col. E. W. M. Mackey; that the notary public, Mr. Hogarth, placed his seal and signature to the testimony as it was handed to him without making any comparison with the originals, as in many instances, as before stated, the originals had been destroyed, and also without making any comparison with his shorthand notes; that is, in every case in which I was present, my impression is that I saw him sign nearly all of the testimony, certainly more than half of it; that in the case of W. A. Zimmerman the testimony as copied by this deponent was submitted to him for his signature, that he declined to sign the same unless certain corrections were made in it, that the testimony as submitted was not correct, and that unless the corrections were made he would not sign the same; that this testimony of Zimmerman's I returned to Mr. Mackey and I never recopied it; and it was not signed by Mr. Zimmerman when I returned it to Mr. Mackey; that in the case of Maj. T. A. Haguenin the testimony as copied by me was handed to him; he glanced over it and said, "I suppose it is all right," and signed it; that I may have submitted other testimony but can not now recall the other cases where I submitted them for signatures; that Mr. Hogarth in certifying these papers would certify a number of them at one time and without comparison as aforesaid.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise now in my own time and be recognized in my own time to finish this.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. WHEELER. Can not this side be recognized the same time as the other side has been recognized?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will not detain the gentleman more than three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will suspend. The Chair did not understand the question of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to be recognized in my own time—as this side has not had as much time as the other side—after the gentleman from Maine has spoken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will proceed, and the other point will be decided afterwards.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to enter into crimination and recrimination in regard to this matter, which seems to me to have no more to do with the issue than it would be if it should be indulged in with respect to any other matter. What is the simple question? There are thirty-two cases of contested seats in this House.

There are thirty-two contested-election cases in this House. The proposition of the rule that has been introduced here is that these cases shall be tried speedily. The objections raised on the other side are in favor of delay. Now, I think there has never been a more absurd practice in this House than that which has obtained heretofore of allowing contested-election cases to run along until toward the end of the Congress. I recollect that in one Congress, I think it was the Forty-eighth, a man was around here until within forty-five minutes of the time of final adjournment, and then he was seated, took his $10,000 salary and his mileage, and went home, and, of course, the other man, whom the Congress decided to be without title, had been sitting here purporting to represent the people of that district during the whole Congress. Gentlemen oppose a speedy trial of these cases on the ground that they fear justice will not be done.

Mr. Speaker, if their position is correct, then we should have no trial of these cases at all. Not an argument has been adduced against the proposition of this rule that does not go to show that there should never be any hearing of contested-election cases in this House. If gentlemen can not get justice here, if the trials of these cases are not to be judicial, but are to be entirely partisan—if that argument obtains to-day, it will obtain to-morrow and until the last hour of this Congress, and, if it be sound, there is no reason why there should be any Committee on Elections or why any gentleman should ever come here to contest a seat. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] says that we want to add 32 members to the Republican roll. Why, in the name of Heaven, does the gentleman from New York think we want to do that? Do we desire to have any more Republican members here unless they have been justly elected? Certainly not.

Why, sir, one almost has to use a telescope now to see our Democratic friends here, so few are they in number, and Heaven knows we do not want to make them any less in number unless some gentleman is a contestant here who, upon the facts and under the law, is entitled to a seat held by a Democrat. The real object of this proposed rule is to do justice and to do it speedily, and if there is any force in the argument used on the other side that this rule ought not to be adopted because under it justice will not be done, then let us appoint no Committee on Elections, but publish to the country that no contestant can have a fair hearing and trial in this House, and that therefore the imperative mandate of the Constitution shall not be obeyed.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the situation in which the House finds itself placed is simply this: There are more contests pending before this body than it is possible for one Committee on Elections, with reasonable diligence, to consider, and the question is, shall a portion of those cases go unexamined, or shall committees enough be appointed to hear them all in an orderly way and within a reasonable time, and to dispose of them? The position in which we find ourselves in this respect is not unusual in other matters.

Very frequently the people of the States have found themselves embarrassed by the clogging of the wheels of justice in their courts, and court commissions have been organized in several of the States to take up appeals and dispose of them concurrently with the State court of appeals or supreme court. In the same way we now have more contested-election cases to deal with than any single committee can dispose of, and it becomes necessary either to send them to subcommittees and allow those subcommittees to report to the full committee and let the full committee adopt their conclusions, or else to appoint committees enough to give a full hearing to every contested-election case.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we have no reason to desire to seat any more Republicans here. Already we have lent our friends more than 100 of our members to fill the empty seats on that side, and how would the minority look with 32 more of them taken away to make room for Republicans? No contestants will be seated unless it clearly appears that they have been elected. But, while we have been capturing so many Democratic districts in the last election, we can not afford to allow Republican districts, where our candidates have been fairly elected, to be misrepresented here. I do not know, sir, because I have not examined the record in any of these cases, whether any gentleman is unlawfully occupying a seat on this floor, but, on the other hand, if the 32 gentlemen now occupying contested seats have been truly elected, it is due to them that the clouds upon their title should be removed, and they ought to be in favor of having that question determined. It is as much to their interest as it is for the interest of the contestants that these cases should be heard and decided speedily.

Much has been said by gentlemen on the other side as to the action of the Fifty-first Congress. That action was long misinterpreted and misunderstood. It was misrepresented until many people in the country believed that some real wrong had been done by the Committee on Elections in that Congress. There were seventeen contested-election cases in the Fifty-first Congress, and I want to call the attention of the House briefly to those cases and to their results. Eight members were unseated. In one case the contestant, Mr. Clayton, was dead, and a subsequent election took place, in which a Democrat, Mr. Breckinridge, was returned; making a change in the membership of this body of 7, and 7 only.

In the case of Smith vs. Jackson, from West Virginia, the gentleman who held the seat held it simply by reason of a clerical error in an election return from one of the counties of that State. The full amount of the votes cast for the contestant not having been correctly written out, the return was defective, and, by reason of that defect, the contestee was seated, although not in fact entitled to the certificate. In the case of Atkinson vs. Pendleton, from the same State, the return was held back by the contestee's friends and a recount was had, and on that recount Mr. Pendleton was given the seat. On the hearing by the Elections Committee it was decided that Atkinson was elected. In the case of Featherston vs. Cate, from Arkansas, the contest was not by a Republican, but by a Populist, and the Populist was found to be entitled to the seat.

In Waddill vs. Wise, from the State of Virginia, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] signed a minority report in which he held that Mr. Wise was not elected and that there should be a new election. That case turned upon this simple point: Five or six hundred voters were prevented from voting by illegal or wrongful challenging; they were held back by the interposition of foolish challengers; and when the polls were closed in the evening those men stood in line waiting to cast their votes. The result of their being refused the right to vote was that Mr. Wise was given the seat. In that case, as I have said, even the gentleman from Georgia signed a report to the effect that there had been no election.

In the case of Langston vs. Venable, from the State of Virginia, there was an ordinary contest turning upon a very large number of questions—a contest in which the Republican was finally seated. In the case of Miller vs. Elliott, from South Carolina, to which reference has already been made, there was never any decent pretense that Mr. ELLIOTT was entitled to the seat. He was ostensibly elected in a district having 26,000 Republican majority—elected simply by throwing out all the tickets that got into the wrong box. Two boxes were placed before the voter; and he was required to put his ticket in the right box or be disfranchised. The ballots that happened to get into the wrong box were all thrown out; and the boxes were shifted from time to time, in order to prevent the voter from placing his ticket into the right box. The only legal question involved in that case was substantially whether or not a man who had gone and deposited his ticket, and had been deprived of the right of having his vote properly counted because the box had been shifted, should have his vote counted by this body. The ballots were held legal and the House counted them as they were in fact cast.

Mudd vs. Compton, from Maryland, was a case where by mistake the judges of the election locked up the returns of the result of a single precinct with the ballots, and sent the box containing the ballots and the certificate to the proper officials, and they refused to have the ballot box opened in order that they might get the returns. In that case the Democrat was given the seat by omitting the return which had been put into the ballot box.

Those are the eight cases to which I referred, including the Breckinridge case, in which the contestant was dead. In those cases the contestees were unseated. On the other hand, there was the case of Eaton vs. Phelan, from Tennessee, in which the sitting member was permitted to retain his seat. In Bowen vs. Buchanan, from Virginia, and Chalmers vs. Morgan, from Mississippi, the result was the same. A similar decision was reached in the cases of Kernoghan vs. Hooker, from Mississippi; of Hill vs. Catchings, from Mississippi, and Threet vs. Clarke, from the State of Alabama. The case of Posey vs. Parrett, from Indiana, was a very close case; and in that case also the sitting member was permitted to retain his seat.

In the cases of McGinnis vs. Alderson, from West Virginia, and Goodrich vs. Bullock, from Florida, the report of the majority of the committee was made in favor of giving the Republican contestants their seats; but neither of those cases was ever reached in the House. Owing to the amount of business in that Congress, and notwithstanding the railroad speed that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] complains of, those two cases in which reports were filed in favor of the contestants were never acted on by the House. If this House will show as good a record as the Fifty-first Congress in the disposition of contested-election cases, no one need be ashamed of its course. In the Fifty-second Congress cases were passed over and not decided at all in committee or House. Of all grievances in election contests it seems to me the worst is when a man who believes he has a just and honest claim to a seat is denied a hearing before the committee or a decision in the House.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, a case from a district in my own State where a contest was made, and the Democratic contestant was seated almost at midnight on the last day of the session. He cast one single yea-and-nay vote, drew his salary for two years, and retired at the final adjournment. His opponent had been permitted to retain his seat and represent the district all through that entire Congress. Now, if it was true, as was claimed by that Democratic body, that the sitting member was not elected, he should have been unseated promptly, not only that his opponent might have drawn the salary, but that the people of that district might have been represented in Congress by the man of their choice.

Such a case ought to have been reported upon and decided promptly, so that the contestant might have had the actual fruits of the contest, those fruits being not merely the matter of salary, but the right to represent the district upon the floor of this House.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is greatly to be regretted that a question of this importance should take on a political cast, and I have regretted exceedingly that on our side of the House as well as on the other there has been a manifest purpose to thrash over some old straw which was harvested many years ago. Brushing away everything that does not touch this question as now presented, what is the exact proposition that we are called upon to meet? Simply that in view of the fact of an unprecedented docket of contested cases we shall create a court for the trial of those causes.

It is agreed on all hands that a committee of fifteen gentlemen sitting down to investigate these cases must necessarily occupy their whole time until the 3d of March, 1897, when we all expect to see a Republican President inaugurated. It would deprive these gentlemen of all opportunity to engage in other matters in which they are interested before this Congress. Therefore the very necessity of the situation appeals to us to provide some sort of instrumentality by which these election cases can be fairly and intelligently disposed of by the House.

Gentlemen have said that undue haste is observed in the disposal of election cases, and I agree, Mr. Speaker, that they are undoubtedly right about that. The very condition of things in this House, the condition of business in the expiring hours of a session of Congress, necessitates hurrying up matters of this sort, so that there can not be that careful, discriminating, judicial treatment of the question that the importance of the subject demands. It is, therefore, to meet that very fault that we propose to inaugurate a new system by which the election contests can be treated fairly, by which they can have sufficient time appropriated to them, and by which they can be tried by a tribunal that will give to them all of the care, all of the attention, all of the opportunities, that the importance of the subject calls for.

Now, it has been suggested that the cases would be decided on a partisan basis in the event of the adoption of this rule. I think, my friends on the other side of the House, that there is not the slightest desire whatever to accomplish such a result. On the other hand, there is no necessity for the party on this side of the House—the party in control—to increase its membership. Why, the great danger that confronts the Republican party in the House of Representatives to-day is its large and unprecedented majority. The same trouble you labored under during the two last sessions of Congress confronts us; and you are my witnesses that your large majority in the House was the bane of your success in the affairs of the House. Now, you should not insist that the Republicans, however wicked they may have been in the past, will steal a seat at this time when they have no need for it. On the contrary, I can assure you gentlemen on that side of the House your cases will receive a respectful, candid, patient, and judicial consideration.

I know, sir, somewhat of the purposes of this movement. It is to change the former practices and usages of the House; and it is a golden opportunity now for gentlemen to enter upon such a reform. It is because the majority of the House have no occasion to take a seat that may not rightfully belong to them that it is desirable to adopt such a measure as this. And we have an opportunity here to provide a tribunal to conduct these election cases in a judicial manner. Ever since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor I have advocated the consideration of these questions on that basis.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Waiving all questions of politics involved in this matter, the important question and the one great consideration, at least on this side of the House, is as to how, in the event of the adoption of this rule, it will be administered. Is my friend in a position to speak for his side of the House, and to assure us that this amendment to the rules, creating three Committees on Elections, if adopted, will not be so administered as to oppress gentlemen on this side of the House whose seats are contested, or is it the purpose that they shall have a fair, judicial, and impartial determination of their cases?

Mr. POWERS. I have no hesitation whatever, Mr. Speaker, in assuring my friend from Georgia that that is the very purpose which promotes the inauguration of this new method of procedure in regard to the determination of election cases.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Then my friend knows that to be the purpose of the gentlemen with whom he associates politically?

Mr. POWERS. I know to a very great extent that that is the purpose. I have conversed with many gentlemen on my side, and all of them with whom I have conversed seem delighted with the prospect of providing some such solution as this for these contested-election cases.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that so long as I have been a member of this body and have had the honor of a seat here I have invariably voted on these questions as if I were deciding the case as a judge of a court. The very first vote I cast in this House was on an election case——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I wish to assure the gentleman from Vermont that I in common with many others on this side share in his estimate of his own fairness. [Applause.] And if we could know that gentlemen on his side of equal impartiality would compose these committees I can say without hesitation that there is a numerous group about me here who would willingly and cheerfully accept the arrangement proposed.

Mr. POWERS. I have no hesitation in assuring my friend from Georgia that all the members who have contested seats here will have the amplest opportunities to have the cases decided, and that they will be decided upon the law and facts as they appear.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, inasmuch as the opportunity is now presented of inaugurating a change in the method and usages that have obtained with both parties in the settlement of these questions, that we ought to join hands, Republicans, Democrats, and Populists alike, in favor of the proposed change.

Why, I agree that undoubtedly the evidence establishes the fact that any political party when pressed hard will strain a point in favor of their own men. As the gentleman from Georgia very aptly said, they are likely to inquire, "Which is our man in this fight?" But in this of all Congresses that question may not appropriately be asked. We do not want to increase our membership for any political purpose. I would rather you should take some of our seats, for the danger we are in is that there are too many of us; and you are the gentlemen who ought to rejoice if we steal your seats, for then you would be able to make campaign thunder of it in 1896, which you know well how to use.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. MILES. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain to the House wherein the proposed changed system would be an advantage. Is it not rather an attempt to facilitate the settlement of these election cases under the same old vicious system?

Mr. POWERS. It is not by any means. The change, my friend, is this: Under the old system you had a court with fifteen judges, and you can not make it efficient unless you double the judicial force. By dividing it into sections you give each individual case more extended time, and it makes it easier for the whole matter to be ventilated before the committee. If you have a court whose docket is crowded so that proper time can not be given to the consideration of each case, somebody will suffer injustice, but if you can have ample time and have a tribunal made up as we recommend shall be in this case, then your committee will have ample time to consider the case honestly, and that is all you ask for.

Mr. MILES. But the gentleman has assumed that when this overloaded court brings its reports to this House, this House would not be guided by the same partisan spirit which has actuated it in the past.

Mr. POWERS. I maintain, sir, that if your side of the House will join in this proposed change and enter heartily into the spirit of this proposition we have advanced, that these cases shall be determined according to the law and the facts, you will have established a beneficent precedent for future Houses to follow.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I like the gentleman's phrase "court," and I would like to inquire if he is willing to assimilate this committee to a court to the extent of compelling its members to take an oath to try these cases as he says they ought to be tried, according to the law and the evidence.

Mr. POWERS. I have no objection to any formalities that may be prescribed for the guidance of this committee. What I insist upon is that it is the only way possible in which a fair, intelligent, and candid consideration of these cases can be made by this Congress during its life. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I believe, Mr. Speaker, there has been recognition of two hours on a side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia occupied an hour. The gentleman from New York was recognized in his own right, and occupied fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I would be glad to take the floor with the view to move the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will permit me.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia might come to some understanding about the matter.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I say I will be glad to take the floor for the purpose of moving the previous question, but I have no desire to unduly curtail debate. The recognitions have been equal, and I would be glad to have a vote to-day.

Mr. CRISP. But this side has not used so much time as the other. I think the gentleman from Alabama wanted time, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], and possibly the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]—not much. The gentleman from New York has three-quarters of an hour remaining, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York did not reserve his time; but, without objection on the part of the House, it will be considered as reserved, if the gentleman from Georgia desires.

Mr. CRISP. I do not think we desire that much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think we can close by unanimous consent. I will ask unanimous consent that fifteen minutes be taken by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], and that then I take the floor.

Mr. CRISP. As I understand, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] desire to offer amendments and to have them voted upon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to the amendments being offered at the proper time, to be read for information.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman has certainly no objection to them being voted upon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Perhaps not. I say I have no objection to them being read for information, but I do not desire to let the previous question operate upon them until I know what they are.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman recollects that the proposition was that these rules should be taken up for consideration and amendment. Now, of course, if our side is not permitted to offer any amendments, I hardly think that we will have had justice in the spirit of the agreement that they would be taken up for amendment, and we have not had an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I say that I do not desire to move the previous question so as to exclude amendments, but I do not think the previous question should operate on any amendment which I do not know.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the gentleman will not demand the previous question until gentlemen have had opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I say that I have no objection to them being read for information, and after they have been read for information we will elect what we should do. Let them be read.

Mr. CRISP. I understand the gentleman's proposition to be that if he approves the amendments he will let them be voted upon, but if he does not approve of them he will not let them be voted upon. We want the judgment of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let us know what the amendments are.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think the time for closing the debate should be fixed first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the amendments can be read for information. That will perhaps aid the House in fixing the time for closing the debate. The Chair understands the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to be simply that he does not desire to have the previous question operate upon amendments which he has not heard and which he might wish to discuss.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. Then, if the Chair is correct in that understanding, the amendments may be read first and then arrangements can be made for limiting the debate.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer this amendment:

And in the consideration in the House of any contested-election case reported by any of said committees six hours shall be allowed for debate if so much be desired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and have it pending.

The amendment was read, as follows:

I move as an amendment to the resolution the following:

"RULE XI.

"POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

"All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating,

1. To the election of members: to the Committees on Elections; which committees shall take up, consider, and report the same according to the date of the receipt of the printed testimony by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to submit.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suppose that no further amendments are in order, but I have no objection to hearing the one the gentleman desires to offer.

The amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY was read, as follows:

That the Speaker shall administer to each member of each Committee on Elections an oath to well and truly try and decide each case according to the law and the testimony.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] have fifteen minutes to close the debate on the other side.

Mr. WHEELER. Will not the gentleman make it twenty minutes? Other gentlemen on this side desire to occupy a few minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Are the amendments to be considered pending?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois agree that these amendments shall be considered as pending?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no; I can not agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. TERRY, to present his amendment.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], and to meet him halfway in the spirit he has expressed for a fair and deliberate consideration of these election cases, I have offered this amendment. Of course, the crucial point in any election case is when it finally comes into this House for its judgment and determination. For that reason we should have a safeguard provided in this very rule creating these three committees—a safeguard which shall operate in this House, the final tribunal, made by the Constitution the judge of the election and qualification and returns of its own members, a safeguard providing and making it certain that here, before this august tribunal, there shall be a fair, full, and reasonable consideration of every contested-election case reported by either of these committees. It may be suggested upon the other side that each election case can be brought in with a special rule, assigning so much time for its consideration in the House; but why leave so important a matter, affecting the membership and dignity of this House, to the whims and caprice of a Committee on Rules? Now is the time to provide for that while we are laying the basis for the settlement of these cases. Let us here and now provide this safeguard, so that we may be certain to have that full and fair and just consideration of every election case advocated by the gentleman from Vermont. I offer my amendment, Mr. Speaker, for that purpose, and appeal to every fair-minded man on both sides of this Chamber to vote for it.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. TERRY, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 166.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 42, noes 186.

Mr. TERRY. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

On ordering tellers 41 members voted in the affirmative, a sufficient number; and tellers were ordered.

Mr. TERRY and Mr. CANNON of Illinois were appointed to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 189.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ABBOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I will state to the Speaker and the House that my seat is contested, and I do not know whether I can with propriety vote in this case. I have an indirect interest in the amendment pending as well as in the rule; and I would like to be advised by the Speaker in regard to my privilege in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not undertake to decide that question. The gentleman must decide it for himself.

Mr. ABBOTT. Then I ask that the House excuse me from voting.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will be considered as excused. The Chair hears no objection.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 201, not voting 89, answered "present" 3; as follows:

ANSWERED "PRESENT"—3.

Black, Ga.	Latimer,	Robbins.

So the amendment of Mr. TERRY was rejected.

Mr. MADDOX (when his name was called). For the same reasons as those submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT], I ask to be excused from voting.

There being no objection, Mr. MADDOX was excused.

Mr. CROWLEY (when his name was called). I ask unanimous consent to be excused from voting.

There being no objection, Mr. CROWLEY was excused.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. HOPKINS with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. OTEY.

Mr. LINTON with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. SULLOWAY with Mr. MEREDITH.

Mr. HULICK with Mr. KYLE.

Mr. CHICKERING with Mr. MCLAURIN.

Mr. RAY with Mr. BOATNER.

Mr. GILLET of New York with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. LEFEVER with Mr. COWEN.

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska with Mr. COBB of Alabama.

Mr. WOOMER with Mr. LAWSON.

Mr. WALKER with Mr. OGDEN.

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. ELLETT of Virginia.

Mr. GARDNER with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. REYBURN with Mr. RUSK.

Mr. PITNEY with Mr. COBB of Missouri.

Mr. APSLEY with Mr. MCRAE.

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. YOAKUM.

Mr. KERR with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. CULBERSON.

Mr. JOY with Mr. SPENCER.

Mr. AVERY with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina, for one day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has offered an amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating,

1. To the election of members: to the Committees on Elections, which committees shall take up, consider, and report the same according to the date of receipt of printed testimony by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There is another amendment, I believe.

The SPEAKER. There is one other.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I hope that will be submitted. I will state frankly my object is to move the previous question upon the original amendment with the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. By consent of the House that can be done. Is there objection?

Several MEMBERS. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. That this amendment may be considered pending for the purpose of moving the previous question. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to offer an amendment to be pending?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think I must decline now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Speaker shall administer to each member of each Committee on Elections an oath to well and truly try and decide each case according to the law and the testimony.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois, before demanding the previous question, allow me a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Some gentlemen appear to think that the amendment which I have offered contains an implication that the members of this House do not respect their oath of office. I not only disclaim all intention of this kind, but I confess my inability to understand how it can be construed in this way. If I did not believe that they would keep an oath after taking it, I would not propose for one to be administered to them. My position is simply this: Gentlemen on both sides declare that these contested-election cases are usually decided according to the political affiliations of the contestant and contestee, and not according to their merits. The majority admit this to be wrong, and aver their intention to remedy it. They profess that their purpose in offering this amendment is to insure "judicial fairness" in the disposition of these contests. Assuming that they are entirely sincere in expressing a desire for "judicial fairness," I simply ask that the committee shall be specially sworn to accord it. My proposition is combated with the statement that the gentlemen who will serve on this committee have already taken one oath and that is sufficient. My answer is that it has not heretofore been sufficient.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very far from assuming that any gentleman on the floor of the House would disregard the obligation of his oath, but I am induced to believe that the general oath taken when they enter upon their duties is not considered by them to cover these particular cases, and I believe that if each member of these committees, who are specially charged with perhaps the highest function of this House, had his attention called by a particular oath to the discharge of a particular duty in a certain way he would carefully and scrupulously observe the obligation.

I know and every other member of this House knows that 95 per cent of the majority follow almost blindly the report of the Committee on Elections, whatever it may be. This being true, I believe that when we are called on to act on the reports of that committee, involving as they do not only the integrity of this House, but involving also the political and property rights of our fellow-members, all ought to have an assurance that they have considered it in a spirit of judicial fairness.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say again to the gentleman from Illinois that this amendment is not intended as any reflection on any gentleman who may occupy a place on that committee. Indeed, if adopted at this time, no such construction could possibly be placed upon it, for we do not now know who are to constitute that committee. With the testimony of all sides that heretofore the House and the Committee on Elections have not considered their general oaths to perform the duties of their office as binding in this particular class of cases, I think we ought to be willing to give every member in the House the assurance that in every case hereafter the contestant and the contestee will have all of the security which is implied by a judicial proceeding.

I believe if the majority intend to act fairly there can be no proper objection to swearing that they will, and surely the gentleman from Illinois does not imagine that we lower the dignity of the House by the adoption of a rule that imposes on a committee such an obligation, in view of the fact that the Constitution of the United States imposes on the Senate, when it sits as a tribunal to try impeachment cases, an additional oath.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask this question: Suppose this amendment is carried and some member shall be appointed on one of these Elections Committees who declines to take the oath, what will be the effect?

Mr. BAILEY. I can only answer by suggesting that suppose a Senator, when the Senate of the United States is sitting as a court of impeachment, declines to take the oath provided by the Constitution.

A MEMBER. But that is the Constitution itself.

Mr. PICKLER. That is another question——

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). The gentleman from Texas must not forget that the Constitution authorizes us to make our own rules.

Mr. BAILEY. But if the gentleman will reflect he will remember that the committees of the House are entirely with the House. The Constitution makes no provision in that regard.

Mr. PICKLER. But it fixes the oath.

Mr. BAILEY. It does not require us to swear that we will perform the duties of our office, but simply requires of us an oath to support the Constitution. That part of the oath in reference to the performance of the duties of our office is prescribed by the statute and not by the Constitution.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does not my friend think that the few moments I have yielded to him are about exhausted?

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his courtesy, and hope I have not abused it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question on the original proposition and the two amendments which have been considered as pending by consent of the House.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating,

1. To the election of members: to the Committees on Elections; which committees shall take up, consider, and report the same according to the date of receipt of printed testimony by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 35, noes 172.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Speaker shall administer to each member of each Committee on Elections an oath to well and truly try and decide each case according to the law and the testimony.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the original amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 1 of Rule X shall read as follows:

"1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint at the commencement of each Congress the following standing committees, namely:

"On Elections, three committees, to consist of nine members each, to be called Nos. 1, 2, and 3, respectively."

Clause 1 of Rule XI to read as follows:

"1. To the election of members: to the respective Committees on Elections."

The amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter that I omitted, and I desire unanimous consent to amend Rule XII as follows: By striking out the word "Territories" where it appears, and inserting after the word "Mining" the words "and two on the Committee on Territories."

The effect of that, as I understand from a hasty examination, is to give the appointment of two Delegates from the Territories as members of the Committee on Mining, as it was in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The same as it was in the last Congress?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—VENEZUELA BOUNDARY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read in full by the Clerk.

The reading of the message was received with general applause.

The SPEAKER. This message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and printed.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a joint resolution——

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Before the announcement of the result on Mr. DINGLEY'S motion, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEFEVER, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINTON, for this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILLER of Kansas, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. CRUMP, for this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARNEY, until January 2, on account of important business.

To Mr. STOKES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. STRODE of Nebraska, until after the holiday recess, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SMITHSONIAN BOARD OF REGENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT reappointed Mr. CULLOM a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of his term as Senator March 3, 1895.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes, relative to ports of entry.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-houses at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa., with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1647) to amend an act approved March 24, 1874, entitled "An act to establish bonded warehouses for storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation;" and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of the appropriation for materials and miscellaneous expenses for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year 1896 for the purchase of articles provided for in the appropriation for the miscellaneous expenses of the Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of the same for the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of the Fruit Growers' Association of California, praying for the construction and ownership by the Government of the Nicaragua Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KYLE. I present a petition of 87 prominent business firms of the city of Aberdeen, S. Dak., praying for the appropriation of $100,000 for the erection of a public building at that place, on the ground that Aberdeen is the second largest business city in the State; that it is the most important railroad center in the State, and situated midway between the Government Indian reservations, which furnish a large amount of United States court business; that there is no suitable building in the city for court purposes, and no jail for criminals, and hence the Government is put to great expense in the transfer of business to other points; and that rent is now paid for post-office, land-office, and United States court purposes equal to a fair interest on the proposed investment. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the Anticombine League of the Twenty-eighth Ward of the city of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom, and also that the first shot fired by British guns on the Venezuelan frontier be taken by the United States as an act of hostility answerable only by war; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of York, Pa., praying that immediate, definite, and vigorous action be taken by the Government on behalf of the Armenian survivors; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fernandina, Fla., praying for the enactment of legislation to reclassify and prescribe the salaries of railway postal clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REMOVAL OF MILITARY DISABILITIES.

Mr. HILL. I introduce a bill which I ask to have read at length.

The bill (S. 1034) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 416 of the laws of 1884 was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 416 of the laws of 1884 is hereby repealed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the bill.

It proposes to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes as amended by chapter 416 of the laws of 1884. The Revised Statutes as amended after the late civil war prohibited the appointment of any person who had served in the so-called Confederate army, in its naval forces, or in any civil capacity from being appointed to an official position in the Army or Navy of the United States. That was the law, and it included every person serving under the Confederate flag in any capacity—military, naval, or civil. That statute was amended in 1884 by providing that it should simply exclude from service in the Army or Navy those who held acommission at the time of the breaking out of the war of 1861. I will read the statute as it now exists, which I think should be promptly repealed by this Congress. Section 1218 as it now stands reads as follows:

No person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion and afterwards served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Mr. President, I can conceive of no good reason why that statute should any longer remain upon the statute books of the United States. There are soldiers throughout this Union to-day who held a commission in the United States Army at the breaking out of the war and who served in the Confederate army who are as loyal as any of those who served upon the Federal side, and I think this is an opportune time to wipe out this statute in the interest of the patriotism of the whole country. It is an act which this Congress can afford to do. It is an act which all those who served in the Federal Army can afford to countenance, and it would be particularly fitting and opportune at this critical period of our history that this statute should be wiped out. No good can come by preserving the memories of that war by such offensive legislation as this. While well enough for the war and for a reasonable period thereafter, it has served its purpose, and now it strikes me that the dictates of patriotism require that the statute shall be wiped out.

Mr. President, I do not apprehend any opposition to this patriotic measure. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this repeal bill may be now put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. PLATT. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the immediate consideration of the bill he has introduced.

Mr. PLATT. Introduced this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Introduced this morning.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will indulge me a moment, I will state that there is a statute in force now which absolutely prohibits the appointment to any official position in the Army or Navy of any person who held a commission at the beginning of our late war and who served in any capacity under the Confederate States. The President or any official having the power to appoint is absolutely prohibited now from appointing any such person to a place in the Army or Navy, in case it was desired so to do. I thought it was an opportune time for the repeal of that statute, believing that no good could come from further encumbering the statute book with it, and I had asked unanimous consent that it might be considered this morning.

Mr. PLATT. Has the bill received more than one reading?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was read the first time by its title and the second time at length.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me a rather remarkable request. Very likely we shall all vote for the bill—I do not know about that—but in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is first upon the Judiciary Committee on this side of the Chamber, I think I must insist on the bill going to the committee.

Mr. HILL. Has the Senator any objection to the bill lying on the table for a short time?

Mr. PLATT. No; I will make no motion about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I suggest that if he wants the bill to pass he should insert in the body of the bill the clauses that are to be repealed. The practice of passing bills to repeal sections of previous statutes merely by referring to the sections by number would be very inconvenient.

Mr. HALE. The rules forbid it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the rules forbid it. The exact language proposed to be repealed should be inserted in the bill the Senator now introduces.

Mr. HILL. It repeals a section of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but even in that case the rule requires, and the convenience of everyone requires, that the words shall be inserted.

Mr. HILL. I am not aware of any such rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am advised that there is such a rule.

Mr. HILL. There is no objection to inserting the language; none whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am advised there is such a rule; but aside from the rule, for the manifest convenience of everyone, so as to know precisely what is repealed, it ought to be stated in every repealing bill; and I think the rule requires it.

Mr. HILL. There is no objection to that course. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the bill lie on the table for the present.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to the bill lying on the table, but it seems to me there is no immediate haste for the passage of the bill. We are not likely to get into a war before the Congress shall reassemble, and really I think that in the passage of all public statutes the usual course ought to be observed; they ought to go to the appropriate committee and be examined. I make no motion in regard to the bill, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1035) authorizing the Sioux City and Omaha Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Omaha and Winnebago Reservation, in Thurston County, Nebr., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1036) granting a pension to Rebecca E. Kutz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1037) for the relief of John Clyde Sullivan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 1043) to strengthen the military armament; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1044) granting a pension to Mary Newman; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present with the bill a petition and evidence in behalf of a private pension to Mary Newman. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1045) to restore S. S. Robinson, late of the Sixteenth United States Infantry, to the Army, and place him on the retired list; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I introduce the bill by request. A memorandum as to where certain evidence will be found accompanies the bill. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT. I have been requested to introduce two bills. I am not quite sure whether they should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Claims, but as the request has been made that they be referred to the former committee, I will ask that reference.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

A bill (S. 1047) for the relief of James H. Cromwell, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1048) for the relief of J. Floyd Johnston, administrator of John Floyd Johnston, deceased, and for other purposes.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 1049) for the relief of the trustees of Stewart College, Montgomery County, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1050) for the relief of the estate of Andrew J. Duncan, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 1051) granting a pension to Elizabeth New, widow of Jethrow New; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1052) increasing the pension of Luvicey J. Summers, widow of William H. Summers, late captain of Company E, Fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and also a soldier in the Mexican war; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 1053) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to contract for the purchase of the letters patent granted to the late Beverly Kennon for his invention of a counterpoise battery; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 1054) to grant pensions to persons of or above the age of 65 years who were brevetted for services or conduct in the late war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RAILROAD TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read, printed, and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether the principal railroad companies acting as common carriers of interstate traffic between the Western States and the Atlantic Seaboard have recently entered into an agreement to frame a joint traffic association; and, if so,

Second. What companies have joined said agreement or have included their traffic therein, and by what individuals said agreement is signed, and what is the amount of the capitalization of each and all of said companies and the mileage thereof.

Third. Whether said agreement binds each company to make and enforce such rates of fares and freights as may be prescribed by a board of officers representing all the companies joining the compact.

Fourth. Whether the agreement provides for collecting from every company a money penalty of $5,000 in each case of violation of such stipulation to make and enforce rates, or a money penalty equal to the gross receipts of the transaction constituting such violation, which money penalty is to be applied for the benefit and to the uses of all the companies except the one offending.

Fifth. Whether said agreement constitutes a combination in restraint of trade and commerce under the existing laws of Congress, or is a violation of the interstate-commerce law.

Sixth. Whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power, of their own motion, to investigate such agreement, and whether or not the same, if unlawful, is subject to arrest by process for temporary injunction, or how otherwise the signers thereof may be proceeded against.

Seventh. What action, if any, has been taken by the Commission or by any other tribunal or officer of the Government with respect to said agreement. And in addition the Commission will transmit to the Senate all correspondence, complaints, and other documents in possession of the Commission concerning said agreement, and the action of the Commission in relation thereto

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present. It will be printed as requested.

FOREIGN OCCUPATION OF ALSAKAN TERRITORY.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate all diplomatic correspondence and other information officially possessed by this Government respecting the establishment or attempt to establish post routes by Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada over or upon United States territory in Alaska; also respecting the occupation or attempted occupation by any other means of any portion of such territory by the military or civil authorities of Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada; also respecting any attempt by Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada to assert any claim to territory of the United States in Alaska.

REBUILDING OF THE SHIP CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, feeling sure that there will be no objection to it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows;

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, estimates of the cost of thoroughly rebuilding the old ship Constitution, now stationed at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy-Yard, with such recommendations as he may deem proper to make on the subject.

IMPRISONMENT OF VICTOR H. M'CORD.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to furnish for the use of the Senate copies of all papers, correspondence, diplomatic or otherwise, on file in the State Department in connection with the arrest and imprisonment at Arequipa, Peru, of Victor H. MacCord, a citizen of Linesville, Crawford County, Pa., in June, 1885, he being at the time consular agent of the United States in Peru, if any have been received by the State Department since the consideration of those transmitted to the Senate by the President, December 6, 1894, and the consideration of the same by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and its report to the Senate February 14, 1895, upon the subject, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, That the President is hereby requested to continue the investigation and efforts heretofore made by the United States in the matter of Victor Hugo MacCord, a citizen of the United States, against the Government of Peru, to the end that such an adjustment of said claim may be made as may be warranted by the facts in the case and by the law applicable thereto."

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida, coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution submitted by Mr. CALL, December 17, 1895:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress or to influence the legislation of Congress; also to investigate and report to the Senate whether corrupt means, bribery, or free transportation have been or are being used to influence such elections; also to inquire and report to the Senate whether the use of such influences or means is consistent with the preservation of the Republic of the United States and the rights and liberties of the people, and to report a bill for the punishment or suppression of such practices.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this resolution has no party consideration or bias. It is demanded by the condition of the country and by the vast power which, under our present economic system, is vested in a few individuals.

I find, by reference to some statistics upon the subject, that there were in the United States in 1880, according to the census reports, 50 persons with an average income of $1,500,000, and over 16,000,000 people with an average income of from two hundred to three hundred dollars—nearly 17,000,000 people with an average income of $300, and 50 persons with an average income of $1,500,000. It is not proposed to find fault otherwise than to say that a better distribution of wealth would be more consistent with our republican institutions; but it is manifest that there can not be such a vast disparity between the masses of the people and 50 persons without their having great influence and control over the elections of the country. Neither will it be possible to maintain the interests of property if 50 persons, exercising this vast power, shall by corrupt means interfere with and control the elections of the country. This would be a destruction of republican government. It would be the creation of an aristocracy, or a plutocracy, rather, vested with absolute political power over the destinies of the American people.

More than ten years ago Mr. Garfield, in the House of Representatives, in a speech which has obtained very general circulation and great approval, pointed out the danger to our institutions of this great concentration of wealth and of its use for political purposes, using the expression that sovereign States were already held in absolute control by it.

Now, it is proposed that a committee be appointed to inquire into the facts whether or not corrupt influences are being used by the few men who manage these great corporations for the control of elections. It was stated in the newspapers quite a short time ago that eight persons—no doubt citizens of great respectability, of distinguished executive ability, men entitled to respect—had met in the city of New York and entered into an agreement to control the taxation for freight and transportation through railroad franchises upon nearly two-thirds of the entire territory of the United States. With a list of employees of a million voters, with revenues aggregating nearly three times—certainly two and a half times—as much as the entire amount collected by the Federal Government, it can not but be, unless there is effective legislation to restrain the exercise of political power, that 50 men may control the elections of the country, of whom these eight were a part. This great accumulation of wealth of 50 citizens, with $1,500,000 average income, is not the legitimate result of commerce, of trade, of enterprise, whatever merit it may have, and I am not here to attack it; but it is the result of legislative franchises, and it is attended with the dangerous incident I have mentioned.

I shall not here speak of evidences which I have in my possession that such influences have been and are being used to control elections to this body, but I ask that this committee may be appointed and that the subject may be investigated. If there be no truth in them, there will be no need of legislation. If the evidence be such as to satisfy this body that such influences are being used, then the consequence inevitably follows that, unless they can be restrained and controlled, either this Government will belong to them and the people will be delivered entirely into their power or there must be extreme and radical legislation against the ownership of these great public highways.

I desire that we shall see if we can not keep the elections pure and prevent the corrupt interference of this vast accumulated wealth in the control of the elections to this body and the other House of Congress, and I hope there will not be any objection to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. We have, Mr. President, a great number of regular standing committees and committees on special subjects to do the business of the Senate, and this resolution proposes to create another committee to deal with the question of the influences which surround the election of members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, a subject which has always been considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in this body. If there is any member of this body who has ever appeared here with a possible taint on his title, the old, carefully established Committee on Privileges and Elections has always considered that question. I should like the Senator from Florida to explain to the Senate what reason there is for believing that on the subject-matter of this resolution, which he apparently has so much at heart, the Committee on Privileges and Elections is not amply competent in its jurisdiction and in its personal make-up to consider this subject. What need is there of departing from the hitherto unvaried practice of the Senate and establishing now a special committee upon this branch of the question of the title of a Senator to a seat in this body? I should like the Senator to tell us why he is not willing that that great committee should consider this class of subjects, as it always has.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is not material to me whether this resolution directs a special committee or the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make the investigation proposed by the Senator from Florida. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Maine that the investigation had better be made by the regular standing committee of the Senate, the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but the Senator from Maine will remember that the Senator from Florida answered at great length at the last session the question which the Senator from Maine now puts to him, apparently for the first time giving attention to the matters which the Senator from Florida has stated as needing investigation in his section of the country.

Mr. HALE. I had not the pleasure of listening to what I have no doubt were the eloquent and convincing remarks of the Senator from Florida. I am derelict in my duty compared with the Senator from New Hampshire. I am not always here listening to everything. I wish I was. I missed hearing the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHANDLER. I endeavor to listen to everything that the Senator from Maine says when he speaks to the purpose, and I endeavor to give equal attention to everything which the Senator from Florida says when he has the honor to address the Senate, and I did listen not very long ago to a statement by the Senator from Florida of the reasons why this resolution ought to pass. I think if the Senator from Maine refreshes his recollection, he will recall the fact that the Senator from Florida modified his resolution from time to time at the suggestion of Senators. It was a different resolution when he first presented it, and when it seemed upon the point of passage some Senator would make an objection to this, to that, and to the other part of the resolution, and the Senator from Florida, with that great courtesy which has always characterized him, modified the resolution, struck out this and that and the other part of the resolution, until I supposed he had modified it even to the satisfaction of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, as the Senator from Florida is so good-natured and has taken every suggestion in the line of enabling him to do what he desires to do, that he take my suggestion, and instead of having a special committee where we have so many special committees, let this matter be sent to the committee which has always investigated this class of subjects, the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I agree that it is well to investigate this subject, if there are organized efforts of corporations to control elections. I am inclined to think there are, and I am inclined to think that they are increasing in this country. I think that the efforts of corporations in one way or another to control and influence representation in this body are becoming a stronger influence, a more dangerous influence, than they have been heretofore, and I suggest to the Senator from Florida that this investigation be made through the regular committees. If he does not consent to that, I will move, and let the sense of the Senate be taken upon the matter, to substitute for a special committee the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I bid the Senator from Florida Godspeed in his investigation. I know the Senator from New Hampshire, who is not an inactive member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, will aid him in this investigation and will help to bring about the desirable result.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the substitute shall be agreed to, I assure the Senator from Maine that I will give diligent attention to this matter, as I endeavor to do to every matter to which my attention is attracted that comes before that committee or the Senate.

Now, whether the Senator from Florida shall be inclined to make this last modification of his resolution will depend, it seems to me, somewhat upon the question of whether it is then to be adopted. The Senator from Florida, after making all his modifications at the last session, was unable to get his resolution through; but left for Florida upon my assurance that I should endeavor to bring it to the attention of the Senate and secure its passage before the adjournment. I brought it up on every proper occasion, and whenever I brought it up there was some new objection made to it or some new modification asked for. I was not authorized to make such concessions and modifications as the Senator from Florida had so freely made. Therefore we stood upon the resolution; but action upon it was at last prevented and the investigation which the Senator from Florida desired to have made has not been made, and now the Senator has renewed his motion.

The Senator from Florida has stated why he thinks there should be an investigation of this nature. He has stated the facts in connection with the conduct of public affairs in his own State, and I think we should show some deference to the Senator from Florida in this connection. I know that if I were in such a grapple with railroads and other corporations in my own State as the Senator finds himself in connection with in Florida, and those corporations were unduly and illegally and by atrocious methods interfering with public affairs in my State, I would come to the Senate confidently asking an investigation, and I should expect some consideration to be given to my request. Now, the Senator from Florida comes with exactly that case and that demand. It seems to me that the Senate should either vote down his resolution or should adopt it in the form in which he proposes it, or as he may consent to modify it, or as it may be the judgment of the Senate it should be modified, and take final action thereon.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Florida accept the amendment which I have suggested?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his amendment. The objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections is, first, that the committee is ordinarily confined to the investigation of the elections of members of this body after they have occurred and to the privileges to which they are entitled. This is an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there is any necessity for legislation to prevent a public evil. It might as well be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but the objection to the reference to either committee is that they will be burdened with a large amount of labor which will exclude them from the performance of the legitimate and proper duties of the committee.

If it be true that this is a subject which requires the attention of Congress, and that the facts should be ascertained by satisfactory evidence whether or not this is a public evil, it will involve a considerable amount of labor and of inquiry, more than any standing committee will be apt to give to it. This has been a public evil, so declared for ten years by leading members of the Republican party; it has been the subject of discussion in the newspapers; it has been commented upon by foreigners who have traveled over this country, who have not hesitated to call the attention of the people of Europe to the fact that we have here a condition of political power which has divested the people of the country entirely of their control of questions connected with these great corporate interests, and has done it by the use of bribery and other corrupt means, and we ourselves in these two Houses of Congress have not escaped the imputation that these influences have been powerful over us. If that opinion shall be allowed to grow, if facts justify that declaration, then, Mr. President, it will be an unfortunate day for the interests of property and for the interests of good government. If there shall have been only occasional instances of this character, then it is necessary that some action shall be taken.

Now, are we to refer this great question, which strikes at the very vitals of the Republic, to a standing committee which has had the opportunity—and I say it without disparagement to that committee—of investigating the subject for ten years, and yet has never found opportunity and occasion to do so? For that reason I hope the Senator from Maine will not insist upon his amendment. I find here that we have special committees of this body upon various subjects. We have a Special Committee to Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front of Washington. That is a subject which belongs to the Committee on Commerce. Why was it not referred to that committee? Because it is a special subject requiring special investigation. We have a Special Committee to Inquire into all Claims of Citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua. Why were not the matters which were referred to that committee referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations? Because they were subjects requiring special investigation. We have special committees on Woman Suffrage, on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, to Establish the University of the United States, on the Quadro-Centennial, to Investigate the Geological Survey, on National Banks, on Forest Reservations, on Corporations in the District of Columbia, to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands, and on the Ford's Theater Disaster.

Mr. President, this subject compares very favorably with all of those subjects which, being within the jurisdiction of standing committees of this body, have yet, because there was special occasion for an investigation, been referred to a special committee. I am therefore strictly in the line of precedent when I ask for this committee, and I am not without authority upon this subject as to its exceeding great importance.

I see it stated in a publication by a Frenchman named Emile Laveleye that 70 persons in the United States own nearly $3,000,000,000 of the values of the United States in legislative franchises for transportation and other corporate interests, while there are nearly 17,000,000 people in this country who save annually only $15, with an average income of $300, and 70 people with, in round numbers, about $3,000,000,000 which derives its value from franchises of taxation granted by this body and the other House and by the States, and when the charge is publicly made that the members of this body and of the other House of Congress are elected by the use of this wealth, accumulated by these franchises, while the employees are living in a state of starvation, it is time, I think, that we should investigate the subject.

When we ask for this special committee on this subject, and it is proposed that it shall be referred to a standing committee, the answer is that it has been the custom of the Senate to create special committees when special investigation was required; and a further answer is that the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the Committee on the Judiciary have been so burdened with work in the last ten years that they have not found the opportunity to bring this subject to the consideration of the Senate. For that reason, and in order that justice may be done to the persons owning these franchises and to these corporations, and at the same time such measures be taken as will preserve this republican Government, without reference to party consideration, I ask that this subject may be investigated, and, as the practical means of doing it, that a special committee be appointed.

In my own State it is a notorious fact that corporations owned abroad, controlled by the American colony in Paris, do interfere with the elections and political affairs of that State; and I say here what I have said before the people of Florida, and propose to say again in the coming canvass at every public meeting in that State where I shall be present, that they do control and have controlled the elections in our State and disfranchised the people, without reference to party.

I ask, therefore, that this subject, which is of national importance, shall have investigation, and have it by a committee that will be sure to give the time and attention required by it.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I should be the very last one to oppose any effort to investigate the matter set out in the resolution of the Senator from Florida, but when we are called upon to appoint a committee, it occurs to me the committee should be charged with some specific duty; should have some ground to act upon and some subject-matter of which it has especial charge.

The resolution reads thus:

> That a special committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress, or to influence the legislation of Congress.

I do not know that there is any charge made relating to the organized efforts of corporations to control the election of members of Congress. It occurs to me that the position taken by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in this particular is eminently correct. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is charged with the specific duty of investigating the taint of title, by reason of any undue influences, of any or every member of this body. Would this committee be charged with any specific power to investigate any specific offense? Would they be charged with the duty of investigating every loose report, every rumor, every piece of political scandal or gossip, concerning the election of a member of this body? It appears so from the resolution. Contests, I am told, have been filed very largely in the other House against the claim of certain members to seats in that body. If a contest pends in the Senate against the seat of any Senator by reason of any undue influence on the part of corporations or other bodies, or of individuals, the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections is the body before whom those charges must be investigated and inquired into. But I should like to know of the Senator from Florida whether or not it comports with the dignity of this body to assume in advance of any charges, of any specifications, that the corporate influences mentioned in his resolution corrupt and assail the seat of any member of this body.

I can not vote for the resolution as it is worded. It would be immaterial to me whether the Senate committee was to be charged with the investigation of a specific matter of the kind I have mentioned, just so that there were specific charges. I think that in such a case the Senate would have a right to appoint a committee of investigation, if, peradventure, the committee already appointed was too full of work to attend to the specific matter. For these reasons I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana, with his views, ought to vote against the entire resolution and not vote for any reference. If the Senator is not advised of the fact that time and again specific charges have been made in this body in regard to the influence of corporations in the election of Senators, he has not read the history of the Senate and is not familiar with it. If he is not advised that time and again men conspicuous in the Republican and the Democratic party have called attention to the growing evil of which I speak and made similar charges, he is not advised of the history of the country. If he is not advised of the fact that time and again in our Presidential elections charges have been made of the improper influence of the controllers and owners of corporations in regard to our elections in both political parties, he is not familiar with our political history.

If the Senator from Louisiana can not distinguish between a great public evil, a threatened evil, acknowledged by all men, stated in the public press, an inquiry as to the specific acts which may justify legislation, and a resolution as to the election of a particular Senator, I think he fails in his logical perception. I am speaking of a public evil. I state in my place in the Senate that it is notorious in the State of Florida. I did not desire to state, but I can state here what I openly state and denounce there, that such influences are believed to have been used and are believed to be now used in that State for the control of its elections. I make that statement without reference to any particular party, either Democratic or Republican, for the men who do those things, distinguished by executive ability, distinguished, perhaps, by the possession of many private virtues, are known to belong to both political parties of the country.

It is known that they demand that their employees shall vote for the men of both parties who are in the interest of the corporations or be discharged from employment. I state that. Not only do I believe this to be true, but a large majority of the people of my State think with me upon the subject and desire that the proposed investigation shall be made; and that ought to be specific enough. The fact that the corporations seek to control the Congressional representation of one particular State is enough to justify the investigation.

If the Senator from Louisiana desires that the country shall be governed by the possessors of this enormous wealth in franchises granted by Congress and by the States; if he desires that the people shall lose all power, I am content that he should have those opinions. I have not. I believe that this is a public evil. If facts shall be ascertained which so demonstrate, I believe that the most severe legislation should be adopted in order to suppress it. I believe that the interests of property, the conservation of private property as well as the rights of the people and the purity of the Government, demand that this action shall be taken by the Senate.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Florida whether he will not confine the scope of the resolution to the charges he makes within the State of Florida. Why make a drag net all over the United States, and reflect on a class of men who are the peers of the members of this body, eminent before the country, and who, as a class, certainly ought to be considered to be just as honest as any other men? If they have not proved so in the State of Florida, and the Senator from Florida desires to make a charge against the railroads of that State, I for one see no reason why a special committee should be appointed to drag the railroad officers or the companies all over the Union into an investigation without direct charges.

I shall vote for the resolution if it is confined to Florida. I shall vote for any resolution where there are direct charges of improper connection on the part of the officers of any railroad in any State with elections, but if it is not confined to cases in which direct charges are made I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I hope I am as able as the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to distinguish a specific charge from a public rumor. I hope I am as able to see the deleterious effect, the injurious effect of unlawful, corrupt interference in the elections of a State for a member of Congress or for a State officer, by a railroad or by any other corporate body, as is the distinguished Senator from Florida. But the honorable Senator from Florida fails himself to see the part and the broad distinction between the Senate of the United States taking cognizance of every partisan, rancorous charge, of every slanderous accusation made in a loose, indefinite form, and a specific charge made against any member holding a seat in this body by reason of corrupt influences.

In my opinion, sir, this body belittles itself by entertaining these loose, indefinite charges against corporations or individuals, whether in the State of Florida or out of the State of Florida. I have heard the Senator from Florida frequently say that there were corrupt influences at work in his State. I believe that that assertion can be made generally, that corrupt influences are at work in nearly every State in this Union; but what is the result of that work? Where does that work come in? If it does not affect the seats of members of this body, what concern have we with that work? Is there any seat in this body tainted by those influences? If any seat in this body is tainted by those influences, I shall not be behind the Senator from Florida in advancing an investigation. But until the kind of work of which he speaks makes itself manifest here, and until some specific charge upon that sort of work is brought here, I shall oppose the appointment of a committee of any kind to investigate these loose, floating, indefinite charges.

The Senator from Florida makes a statement; I do not gainsay it; but before the Senate can take cognizance of the statement it must be embodied in some definite form. It must be averred to have some definite, deleterious, injurious effect before I believe this body is called upon to take any definite action. Wherefore it is that I oppose the resolution.

Mr. CALL. If there are any Senators here who desire to except particular States from the proposed inquiry, it is not for me to oppose their action. My own primary concern is an investigation in the State of Florida, and I am entirely willing, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, that it should be confined to that State. I think it is not wise, however, to limit the inquiry to any particular State. I have no reflection to make upon the election of any member or this body. I have none to make upon the men of distinguished ability who control these great corporations. I have no complaint to make against the wealth which they have legitimately acquired under existing laws.

The resolution touches none of those points. It simply provides that an inquiry shall be made by a select committee (I shall change the word "special" to "select") because there is a general, a universal, opinion that either by subordinates, possibly by men not connected with the owners of the stocks and the bonds of these great corporations by persons who are subsidiary and who have personal interests of their own, and greatly to the injury of these corporations, power is exercised over the employees to enforce action upon their part such as may desired by the persons in authority. I say there is such a universal opinion, and I cited the statements of Mr. Garfield to that effect.

The Senator from Louisiana desires me to make charges against the election of some Senator here. I am not discussing that proposition. I am willing to admit that all Senators have been elected properly and are entitled to their seats here. I have no charges of that kind to make. I say it is believed in the State of Florida that the influences of corporate power and authority, not only of transportation companies, but of other corporations, have been used and are being used to corrupt legislation, to disfranchise the intelligent people of the State who are qualified to exercise the franchise, and to keep in force laws which received the public reprobation, and I ask that the evidence may be obtained. I am not a personal witness of the acts which constitute the offense. I say that there is a general public opinion to that effect.

The representatives of these particular interests have been placed in power, in public office, in political power in the different party organizations in that State. They are known to be the representatives of those special interests. Proof has been made to that effect. It is known that they exercise a controlling power, and they are admitted by men in all political parties in that State to be important factors in the improper control of elections in the State, not by persuasion, not by contributions of money for legitimate purposes, but by putting in office men paid to serve their interests and promote such legislation here and elsewhere as may be for their benefit, without reference to the interests of the people at large.

Therefore, I hope the Senator from Louisiana will not oppose the appointment of a select committee to be charged with this nonpartisan duty, having no reference to any political party, but in the interest of honest and fair elections.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will again be read.

Mr. CALL. Before that is done I ask permission to modify the resolution by changing the title of the proposed committee from "special" to "select committee." The committees other than standing committees are termed select committees.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made. The resolution will be read as modified.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HALE. I am inclined to think, on this reading, that the resolution needs still further pruning. It is a very serious question whether any committee of the Senate ought to be instructed to investigate the reasons or influences controlling members of the House of Representatives. That body has rules of its own. That body has jurisdiction of its own, somewhat under the rules of the House and somewhat under the general law.

The Senator from Florida does not propose by a general law to create a form and manner and extent of investigation into questions relating to the title of members of the other House, but that a select committee of the Senate shall investigate into the reasons and practices influencing the election of members of the House of Representatives. I suggest to the Senator, who, whatever he wants to accomplish here, certainly does not seek to meddle with the jurisdiction of the other House, that he at any rate confine the proposed inquiry to elections of members of the Senate, for clearly, without repeating myself, we have no business to set on foot a committee of our own to investigate into the influences that control the members of the other branch of this Legislature.

When that is done, if the Senator from Florida accepts my suggestion and amends the resolution accordingly, I shall not make a motion. Otherwise I shall move to strike out that part of the resolution, and let it be confined to the election of members of this body. [A pause.] I move that amendment. I ask the Secretary to state it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5 it is proposed to strike out the word "Congress" and insert "the United States Senate;" so as to read:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of the United States Senate.

Mr. CALL. I think the Senator from Maine will see, upon reflection, that his observations upon this point are not well founded. The resolution has nothing in the world to do with inquiring into the motives, as such, of the election of members of the other House. It simply asks for an investigation, not to ascertain whether bribery has occurred, but to show the necessity of preventing corrupt influences in the election of members of Congress.

We are legislating for the United States. We are legislating not for this body in its representative capacity, but for the Republic, for its future destiny, for its greatness, for its perpetuity. We say that if the power to control elections is, by the use of money, vested in the great concentrated wealth of this country, held by from 50 to 70 individuals living in Paris, without American sentiments and without sympathy with the mass of our people, it is a public evil, and legislation should be enacted to prevent it.

Now, I am not here to decry the owners and possessors of this great wealth. In my own State they are men of distinguished ability. They are men, I have no doubt, who are patriotic, but I say it is a public evil that by some means this great power is being used, and it ought to be prevented. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says we have no power to do what? To see that the political power of this country, in the elections by the people, is not influenced by the use of money and corrupt practices. The Senator from Maine will not insist upon that proposition. We have nothing to do with the election of a member of the other House as such. The House has a sovereign authority over that matter, but we, as a part of the legislative power of this country, are charged with the duty of seeing that the people are not corrupted by the use of money and are not prevented by its use from exercising their rightful authority under the laws of the different States in the election of members of Congress and members of this body.

It is legitimate to say that corporations shall not use the power to discharge their employees unless those employees vote according to the instruction of their superiors. It is legitimate to punish the men in charge of those employees who forbid them from exercising the franchise and the right of an American citizen to vote as he thinks best and proper. I acknowledge the conservative influence of wealth, I am in favor of preserving it to a reasonable and just extent, but I am not in favor of allowing a few men to capture whole States of this Union and send their representatives here.

I have no intention of dragging the State of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] or any other State into the proposed investigation. I have no purpose of making any charges against or imputations upon the men controlling those great organizations. But I do say that if they desire to preserve those interests they must carefully see that such legislation is had as will not allow improper influences to be used in the elections of the country, so as to control the public policy of this country and to deprive the people of their rightful control. This is a proposition which I think we as Democrats or Republicans or Populists alike are interested in seeing successfully carried through. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will not be adopted. I hope he will withdraw it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the objection made by the Senator from Maine fails to discriminate between the legislative and the judicial power of the two Houses. If the object of the resolution were to inquire into any facts which relate to the validity of the title of any member of the House of Representatives to his seat in that body, certainly his objection would be valid, because under our system of government each House is the sole judge of the elections and the qualifications of its own members. But the resolution has a very much wider scope than that. It not only has a wider scope, but it does not embrace that idea in it at all. There is no suggestion in the resolution or on the part of the mover of the resolution to inquire into the validity or the regularity of the election of any member of either House of Congress. The resolution relates to a matter of public policy, to a matter which may or may not be within the legitimate scope of the legislative power of Congress. That is the question to be determined. It looks to legislation and not to judicial action, and as it looks to legislation one House of Congress as well as the other may initiate legislation upon the subject of the purity of elections, which will embrace the election of members of the other body as well as its own House.

If the resolution should eventuate, as it contemplates, in a recommendation by the committee, after ascertaining the facts, that certain legislation ought to be passed, then their recommendation must be considered as well by the Senate as by the House of Representatives. It must receive the concurrence of both Houses or it fails to become legislation at all.

I call the attention of the Senator from Maine, therefore, to that broad distinction between what we call the judicial powers of each House as to the elections and qualifications of its members, in which case each House is the sole judge and can not be interfered with by the other, and the legislative power—power which looks to the passing of a rule, the enactment of a law which shall govern as well the election of members of one House as of the other. I think if the Senator from Maine would give his attention to that distinction he would not insist upon his objection.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Mississippi, who is a very good lawyer, has sought to do what the Senator from Florida did not attempt to do, to answer my objection. I see the force of what he says and what is running in his mind. Undoubtedly there is the distinction which he draws between the legislative power, which lies in either body, by legislation to frame laws with penalties to punish frauds and improper influences. But the Senator from Florida does not seek to do that. If the Senator from Florida had reported from a committee a general statute involving the exercise of the legislative power of this body coordinately with the other, seeking to remedy an evil, perhaps applicable here as well as there, it would be one thing. But he, by a resolution of this body alone, seeks to set afoot a committee to investigate into the circumstances attending the elections of members of the other body.

That can not be done without summoning testimony and taking evidence as to the particular facts that bear upon the election of members of the other branch of this Legislature, with which we have nothing to do. That is not our business. We are not legislating generally and invoking the legislative power, the legislative domain, of this body, which, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi, exists in legislative proceedings, but we are proposing to investigate like a committee of elections, as a substitute for the Committee on Elections, and not as a law committee, into the circumstances attending and surrounding the election of members of the other body.

I repeat, we have nothing whatever to do with that. If the Senator wants a committee to look into the facts and the malign influences surrounding the elections of members of this body I am willing he should have it. I am trying to put the resolution into such condition that some of us can vote for it. The Senator from Florida is so persistent in declining every suggestion, that he is driving us to vote against his whole resolution. What ought to be done in this case is to empower and direct the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate into these alleged malign influences and report to this body; and that committee would do it. It is so made up of distinguished old and younger members of this body, and it is not a committee overburdened with work. The Senator ought to be willing to intrust his case, if he has a case against these corporations, to that great committee. I insist on my amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Maine so readily accepts the distinction which I pointed out in the remarks which I submitted to the Senate. He has gotten to be very nearly right now. The trouble with the Senator from Maine is that he misconceives the resolution now before the Senate. As I believe the Senator from Maine to be a fair man and desirous of doing what is right, I would respectfully call his attention to the wording of the resolution, as I shall call the attention of the Senate to it.

Before I do so I may as well make the general remark that the initiation of all legislation depends upon some sort of information concerning the matter about which the legislation is to take place. As the old law books stated it, in every statute the first thing to be considered is the evil; next, the state of the old law, and, thirdly, what remedy ought to be provided. So it is an essential part of the idea of enacting a law that there should be information upon which to base the legislation. That information may come to us through the public press, through history, through the general knowledge of members of the legislative body as to the facts calling for legislation, or it may come to us in cases which are not of such general notoriety by reason of an investigation made under the order of the legislative body itself.

It would certainly be a little singular if, without any suggestion from any source whatever, without any investigation or report of facts, the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States should undertake to pass a law in reference to corrupt practices as indicated in the resolution. Therefore, he who desires to move the legislative mind in that direction ought first to give the legislative mind instruction on that subject. The proper way to get that instruction is by investigation, and the proper way to get the investigation is by a committee. As to whether that investigation ought to be by a select committee or by one of the standing committees of the Senate I have nothing to say. That is not the issue between the Senator from Maine and myself.

I insist that this resolution has not a particle of judicial aspect in it. It does not look to the unseating of any member of either House, to casting any suspicion upon his title, but it looks to getting information for the Senate, in order that the Senate may, if it sees proper when that information is gotten, initiate some new legislation. To satisfy the Senator from Maine upon that subject I call his attention to the few last words of the resolution:

> Also to inquire and report to the Senate whether the use of such influences or means is consistent with the preservation of the Republic of the United States and the rights and liberties of the people, and to report a bill for the punishment or suppression of such practices.

So, if the Senator from Maine will give his usual careful attention to the reading of the resolution he will see that it looks alone to the acquiring of information upon which legislation may be based. I hope that the Senator from Maine, with his usual candor and fairness, when he sees that it does not look to anything else but legislation, will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida has no objection, I desire to make an inquiry. Does the Senator from Florida understand that under his resolution the committee appointed would be permitted to travel all over the United States?

Mr. CALL. There is no suggestion made of the committee traveling anywhere under the resolution.

Mr. WHITE. Then the investigation is to be made entirely here?

Mr. CALL. If there should be any occasion to ask for such authority it would have to be done hereafter.

Mr. GEORGE. By a separate resolution.

Mr. WHITE. I simply desire to say that if the committee should see fit to visit my State we would be very glad to show them around. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL. I have no doubt the committee would be very glad to be shown around by the Senator if it should go there; but there is nothing in the resolution to give the committee authority to travel around anywhere or to do anything more than make the investigation here.

Mr. CAFFERY. I inquire of the Senator from Florida whether or not in the bill which he proposes shall be reported or contemplates the reporting of he desires any of the clauses of the late Federal election law, which we repealed with great unanimity on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. CALL. That is a very singular question for the Senator from Louisiana to ask. I do not propose to report any bill except such as should meet the approval of the members of the committee. Consequently it is very difficult for me to say what will be the mind of the committee. But I will say that whether it be in an election law or not, whether it shall have been in any previous legislation of Congress or not, I shall be in favor of reporting a bill that will prevent the use of bribery and corrupt practices of every kind to influence the election of members of Congress and the legislation of these bodies. I shall be in favor of a bill that will effect those purposes to the best of my judgment and ability.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Florida, that an analysis of his resolution shows in the first paragraph of the first sentence no offense whatever, except, perhaps, a violation of moral propriety:

That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress or to influence the legislation of Congress.

The organized efforts of corporations to control the election of members of Congress or to influence legislation may be improper, but it certainly does not come within the category of a crime. There are organized efforts made all through the United States to influence the election of members of Congress. It is to be presumed from the statement in the resolution that no improper or rather corrupt influence must be used or was used. But the resolution goes on:

Also, to investigate and report to the Senate whether corrupt means, bribery, or free transportation have been or are being used to influence such elections.

And the committee is directed to report by bill or otherwise. Whenever this body, in conjunction with the coordinate branch, is charged with legislation upon this subject, I imagine they will not stop at bribery or other corrupt influences. I imagine that they will take the whole domain of legislation. I rather suppose that if the other side of the Chamber is triumphant, as it now appears to be, we shall have a reenactment of the late election law wherein intimidation, force, or the other offenses mentioned under that law will be included in the bill to be reported.

It occurs to me that the States are primarily charged with the investigation which the Senator from Florida desires; that if there are corrupt influences at work in Florida or in any other State, the domestic forum is the proper tribunal where these matters are to be investigated, and where legislation against the corrupt practices can be easily procured if it does not already exist. It seems to me that the Senator is asking of Congress to do that which, perhaps, he might not relish when his wish was gratified. We have condemned upon this side of the Chamber the interference of the Congress of the United States at the election of members of Congress, and this appears to be an effort to revive those repealed laws in another direction. I think from that standpoint, at least, as one on this side of the Chamber, I am warranted in voting against the resolution.

Mr. CALL. I wish to disclaim any such purpose. There is nothing of the kind in the resolution. There is nothing in the resolution of the kind objected to by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has conclusively shown that I answered his proposition in the beginning by stating the difference between an investigation of the election of a member of Congress and an investigation for the purpose of so legislating as to prevent improper influences in elections.

The Senator from Louisiana now talks about what he imagines. He may imagine wrong or he may imagine right. It is for the committee to say when they meet together, and the Senate to determine what kind of a law shall be passed, if any shall be passed. For myself I am not in favor of any violent and improper interference with the States in the exercise of their right to regulate the elections. But this is not the question. This is a question as to whether great corporations, having power to control the elections in Louisiana and send Senators here who shall not represent the people, but represent them, shall be permitted to do so, while the people of Louisiana are held bound and fettered by these corrupt influences and disfranchised of their right.

That is the condition in some States of the Union, and it is so charged and well known to members of this body that that is the great public evil that the people of this country complain of, that the power of the people is being taken away and vested in the fifty or seventy men who hold $3,000,000,000 of the wealth of this country in legislative franchises of taxation, just as if a sovereign decree had been passed vesting in them power to tax without limit the people of this country. The question is whether that state of things exists and whether legislation shall be had by the representatives of the people to prevent the use of this great power and this money in the elections to this body. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. CALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRYE. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, strike out the word "Congress" and insert "the United States Senate;" so as to read:

That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of the United States Senate, or to influence the legislation of Congress.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEWELL. I now offer the amendment which I suggested, and to which I trust the Senator from Florida will agree. In line 4, after the word "corporations," I move to insert "in the State of Florida;" so as to read:

That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations in the State of Florida, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress, or to influence the legislation of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. SEWELL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. My colleague [Mr. GORDON], who is absent, is paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. GEAR. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the negative). I overlooked the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained from the Senate by sickness.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (after having voted in the negative). Since voting, I have discovered that my pair is absent, and I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "nay" if I had the privilege of voting.

Mr. BRICE. I am paired with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I withhold my vote, as I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. WILSON. I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO]. As I am not informed how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS. I was requested by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Both Senators are absent.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Caffery,	Hale,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Faulkner,	Hill,	Perkins,	Shoup,
Frye,	Lodge,	Platt,	Smith,
Gallinger,	McBride,	Proctor,	Wetmore.

NAYS—32.

Allen,	Call,	Harris,	Quay,

Cullom,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,	Wilson.
Daniel,	Irby,	Pritchard,
Elkins,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,
Gear,	Martin,	Squire,

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. HALE. There is another amendment that I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, strike out the words "a select" and insert "the;" and after the word "committee" strike out the words "of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who" and insert "on Privileges and Elections," so as to read:

That the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress, or to influence the legislation of Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am not going to take up any more time of the Senate, but simply call the attention of Senators to the fact that if this investigation is granted, which I have not opposed, and expect to vote for, instead of multiplying committees, creating new ones and select ones, upon subjects-matter that inherently, intrinsically belong to the old committees of the Senate, we ought to send them to those committees. This is a very great subject; it touches the constitution of this body, the make-up of the membership of the Senate, the influences that surround the elections. We have a committee and have always had a committee that is charged with the great duty of inquiry into that subject. I do not believe that any select committee, that any committee appointed by the Chair, impartial as the Chair is, can bring to this subject the qualities that are necessary for its thorough investigation equal to the Committee on Privileges and Elections that has taken into its domain all such subjects.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the Senator from Maine that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been under consideration during the morning hour.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order that the matter which has been under consideration may be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair entertains the motion of the Senator from Florida. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. CALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP].

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. MILLS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—38.

Allen,	Call,	Harris,	Proctor,
Bacon,	Carter,	Hill,	Roach,
Baker,	Chandler,	Kyle,	Smith,
Bate,	Chilton,	McBride,	Teller,
Berry,	Cockrell,	McMillan,	Thurston,
Blackburn,	Davis,	Mantle,	Tillman,
Brice,	Dubois,	Martin,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Faulkner	Mitchell, Wis.	Walthall.
Butler,	Gallinger	Peffer,
Caffery.	George,	Perkins,

NAYS—12.

Cameron,	Hale,	Morrill,	Sewell,
Elkins,	Lodge,	Platt,	Sherman,
Frye,	Morgan,	Quay,	Wetmore.

NOT VOTING—35.

Aldrich,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Squire,
Allison,	Gray,	Murphy,	Stewart,
Blanchard,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Vest,
Clark,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Vilas,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Daniel,	Irby,	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Gear,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,	White,
Gibson,	Jones, Nev.	Pugh,	Wilson.
Gordon,	Mills,	Shoup,

So the motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays upon that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the proposition of the Senator from Maine, substituting the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a special committee, will not prevail. I do not think that committee desire to have the resolution referred to them. It will relate, in all probability, entirely to the elections in one State in which I am particularly interested, and I think that, inasmuch as that is the case, there should be a select committee, and not the Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that I may have some share in directing the investigation. It will be enough that should there be legislation recommended, it will then go before either the Judiciary Committee or, if the Senator from Maine be right, which I do not think he is, in its subsequent stages, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Why, then, shall we confine this proposed investigation to that committee, and not allow a select committee to be created for the purpose? The members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections are charged with other duties. They are all members of other important committees. They have not had the time, and have not now, to give this subject the complete investigation which a select committee may give it. As the Senate has been in the habit of appointing, and as we have a dozen select committees here appointed upon much slighter reasons than exist in this case, I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment and will not refer the subject to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I am informed by the Senator generally in charge of pairs on the other side that he is not certain how the Senator from Virginia would vote if present, and under the circumstances I withhold my vote.

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. He not being present, and I not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Blackburn,	Elkins,	McBride,	Sewell,
Brice,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Burrows,	Frye,	Morgan,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Gallinger,	Morrill,	Walthall,
Cameron,	Hale,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Carter,	Harris,	Platt,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,
Davis,	Lodge,	Quay,

NAYS—24.

Allen,	Call,	Hill,	Pettigrew,

Berry,	Dubois,	Mitchell, Wis.	Tillman,
Butler,	George,	Peffer,	Turpie.

NOT VOTING—32.

Aldrich,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Squire,
Allison,	Gray,	Murphy,	Stewart,
Blanchard,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Vest,

Gordon,	Mills,	Shoup,	Wilson.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CALL subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution providing for an investigation was just passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Florida to reconsider will be entered.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 20th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Friday, January 3, 1896.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid the resolution before the Senate, and, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

USE OF COURT-HOUSES AT SCRANTON AND WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-houses at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.

The amendment was to add at the end of the joint resolution the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, at any time to terminate this permit and the possession hereby granted of either or both of said premises upon thirty days' notice to the commissioners of the county wherein the same is situated; and on such termination all further payment therefor shall cease.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment proposed by the House of Representatives is entirely unobjectionable, and I move that it be concurred in by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1647) to amend an act approved March 24, 1874, entitled "An act to establish bonded warehouses for storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES, BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of the appropriation for materials and miscellaneous expenses for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year 1896 for the purchase of articles provided for in the appropriation for the miscellaneous expenses of the Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of the same for the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896, was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I will first state that it does not increase any appropriation, but simply removes the objection which the Comptroller has made to the expenditure of a certain sum of money in the appropriation law for certain items, which he says must be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Treasury Department when there is no contingent fund sufficient to do it, and when Congress did not intend that it should be paid out of the contingent fund.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 19, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 17, 1895.

CHIEF OF WEATHER BUREAU.

Willis L. Moore, of Illinois, to be Chief of the Weather Bureau, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate, vice Mark W. Harrington, removed.

PROMOTIONS IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Third Lieut. James G. Ballinger, of Washington, to be a second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Horace B. West, promoted.

First Asst. Engineer Henry C. Barrows, of New York, to be a chief engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Frank H. Pulsifer, placed on waiting orders.

Third Lieut. John G. Berry, of Maine, to be a second lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Samuel Howard, placed on waiting orders.

First Asst. Engineer William F. Blakemore, of New York, to be a chief engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed James M. McDougall, placed on waiting orders.

Second Asst. Engineer Denis F. Bowen, of New York, to be a first assistant engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Frank B. Randall, promoted.

Second Asst. Engineer Harry L. Boyd, of Maryland, to be a first assistant engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Henry C. Barrows, promoted.

Second Asst. Engineer Harry U. Butler, of Maryland, to be a first assistant engineer in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed Charles F. Coffin, promoted.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VENEZUELA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2173) making appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the President, to investigate and report upon the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon unanimous consent to the present consideration of the bill which has been reported to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, do I understand it is proposed to pass the resolution without discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I dislike very much to object to the consideration of a resolution presented by my distinguished friend from Illinois; but it seems to me that this subject is one of such vast importance and such serious gravity that the House of Representatives ought to proceed in a decorous and deliberate manner in its consideration. Late on yesterday the President's message was read to us. I presume most of us have read it more or less carefully in the newspapers. Very little time has been given to the consideration of that very remarkable document, and it seems to me that possibly all the members of this House may not be at this time fully advised as to the scope of responsibility which may attach to the adoption of this resolution. [Cries of "We are ready!" on the Republican side.] Gentlemen about me say that they are ready. That may be; but at the same time I feel convinced that I am doing service to the dignity and interests of my country when I ask those ready gentlemen, on this side or the other, to use in a matter of this momentous importance the cool deliberation and judicious procedure that are due to a matter that may vitally affect the interests of the two great English-speaking nations of the world. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been accused in times past of being somewhat of a "jingo," whatever that may mean. I hope that there is no impression in any part of the country where I may be known that I would falter at any time in upholding the honor and the prestige of my country, and when the moment occurs that the United States Congress, upon a full and deliberate consideration of facts presented, shall determine that either the honor, the safety, or the dignity of my country requires that we take up arms in a just cause against one or all the nations of the earth you will not find me lagging in the rear. But, Mr. Speaker, the public press of this morning brings us abundant evidence of the feverish excitement precipitated in this country by the message that ought to cause us to take counsel of our wisdom. The eyes of the civilized world are directed to-day to this House of Representatives and to the Senate of the United States, and, without abating one jot or one tittle of my desire that every right we have and every right we intend to maintain in the future shall be upheld, I do think we had better give to a matter of this extreme gravity at least as much appearance of deliberate consideration as we insist upon giving to any trivial matter of an appropriation of a few thousand dollars.

Now, sir, I have said all I desire to say at this juncture. I hope that it may be the disposition of the gentleman who has presented this matter and of the House to permit this resolution to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the regular way, to be carefully considered, so that a resolution may be framed upon such lines as will meet all the requirements of the situation and as will leave the House of Representatives of the United States in the attitude of calmly considering and acting upon a great question concerning which the Executive himself, possibly for the first time in the history of such correspondence, has outlined the possibility of armed conflict between the two great Anglo-Saxon peoples of the earth.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have not objected. I have simply suggested a hope that this matter may go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, appreciating all that was said by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and the patriotic impulse that led him to make his remarks, I desire to say a word in explanation of the bill and its purpose, which I trust will satisfy everyone in this House—and I will say it without mentioning this side of the House or that side. I hope we have not two sides of the House when it comes to a question of this kind. [Loud applause.] The President of the United States on yesterday sent a message to this House, at the conclusion of the reading of which the House adjourned; there was hardly time for deliberate action; and it might, perhaps, have been deemed precipitate if taken at that time; but we have all examined it after having heard it read from the desk. After a general discussion in that message of doctrines, policies, and national interests, there is a request made directly by the Executive to this House for action to aid him in the exercise of his Executive functions.

It is a part of the Executive function to ascertain the facts relating to any question in negotiation with a foreign country. The gravity of the case is such that the President suggests a mode of determining a cardinal question in the controversy, and he asks us to cooperate with him by enabling him to appoint three or more men to examine the records and evidence and the facts involved. In this contention between two great Governments the first fact for us to remember as patriotic Americans is that the success of our country in its contention depends, above all, upon our presenting a united front, so that all Americans shall appear to be one and that our Government shall speak for all the people of the United States. [Applause.] And the prompt response of the people's representatives here, according this small sum of money to pay the expenses of an investigation, which the President says shall be carefully and judicially made, and with the least delay possible—a suggestion of promptness which I am sure was made in good faith and will be so carried out by an American President—we answering in that spirit which becomes Americans and promptly granting the appropriation, the spectacle will be presented to the foreigner, to our opponent, of a Republic that is as one man. [Applause.]

In negotiations of this character any officer charged with the duty of representing his Government is hampered and the opponent is encouraged by every word of dissent that comes from his home. Every criticism behind the officer's back puts him at a disadvantage, and hesitation by this Congress, the postponing of this simple question of an appropriation to aid the President in performing an Executive function, would be construed by the British press and the British Government as evidence that the people of the United States were not in accord, that his action in the matter had some relation to party tactics, and that he did not speak the voice of the American people.

Let us answer and do our duty, all of us, now. We shall have long days in which to discuss the Monroe doctrine and the exact words in which it should be formulated if we do not agree with the precise terms in which Mr. Olney or the President has put it. But on this particular matter now presented discussion of various views only confuses and gives aid and comfort to those across the sea. Any disclosure of dissent here—and at bottom there really is none—any appearance of dissent would not aid, but would hamper, those who are clothed by the Constitution with authority to speak for the nation and charged with this great duty. I hope, therefore, that the House will proceed to pass the bill without delay. I have made these few remarks, not from any desire to speak or debate myself, but merely as a suggestion by way of guidance to the immediate action which I believe we ought to take, and in which I hope all will concur.

And now, Mr. Speaker, unless there is some considerable body of gentlemen here who desire discussion, I will move the previous question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman a slight modification in the bill. It appropriates $100,000, and I would suggest that he add the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. HITT. I accept that amendment.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the gentleman to withhold the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. HITT. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, together with all on this side of the House, I rejoice that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has been recognized to ask consideration of the bill which has just been read at the Clerk's desk. It does seem to me that there can be no division in this House as to the propriety of the immediate passage of that bill. For a great many years there has been a controversy as to the divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. We respectfully invited Great Britain to submit the controversy between that Government and the Republic of Venezuela to arbitration. Great Britain has declined arbitration. Now, what are we to do? If the American people have a fixed opinion upon any question, it is the opinion that no European country shall be permitted to acquire territory on the American continent by force. [Applause.] Now, the question is, what are we to do——

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman at his request, and I was glad to do so, because he is a very distinguished and experienced member of this House, but I yielded for what I supposed was to be a suggestion about the bill, and I beg the gentleman now not to try to precipitate general debate upon this subject.

Mr. CRISP. Surely he will accord to me the privilege of occupying as much time as he occupied; especially as he has presented this morning the bill which I tried to introduce yesterday.

Mr. HITT. But I beg the gentleman not to go into a discussion of the merits of the question at this time.

Mr. CRISP. I did not intend to do that. I simply desired to suggest that, inasmuch as Great Britain has declined arbitration of this controversy, we are bound to ascertain, and to ascertain speedily, on which side lies the right, and that is the object of the President's message and of this bill. If we are not to have the assistance of Great Britain in ascertaining the facts by means of an arbitration, then we must ascertain them for ourselves, and we ought to do it at once.

The suggestion of my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] to wait until a committee is appointed means to wait three weeks, while we should at once authorize the appointment of this commission and the payment of its expenses so that it may proceed, as I have just said, to ascertain where the right is; and everyone may rest assured that when we ascertain where the right is we have the courage and the manhood to maintain it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] allow me to ask him a question? I was trying to get his attention while he was on the floor. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky addressed the Chair while the Speaker was proceeding to put the question.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield me two minutes only.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman will pardon me; I can not. I know the patriotic spirit which animates him; but he will have to pardon me. I can not do it.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I simply desire to say that I heartily indorse the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois does not yield.

Mr. HITT. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not press the previous question without permitting me to ask him what the scope of the resolution is.

The question being put on ordering the previous question, it was ordered. [General applause.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HITT. I ask that the Clerk read the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill as amended will be read.

The Clerk read the bill as amended by inserting after "$100,000" the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The question being then put on the passage of the bill, it was passed.

[The announcement of the result was received with loud applause on both sides of the House.]

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TELEGRAM FROM A CITIZEN.

Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, a citizen of this country, a resident of the State of Alabama, desires to make a communication to the Government. I have a telegram just received which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk as a communication from this citizen. I know no better way to present it to the House, and will simply add that I have known him for years; I knew him under circumstances which satisfied me——

The SPEAKER. This proposition requires unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS. What is it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRISON] asks that a telegram from a citizen of Alabama be read. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL objected.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was about to ask what the object is.

Mr. HARRISON. Simply that a citizen may communicate with the Government——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please be in order. Objection has been made.

Mr. HARRISON. I think if gentlemen on the other side understood this proposition——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please be in order. Any member has a right to object to such a proposition, and objection has been made.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield, sir.

HOLIDAY ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 20th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock m. on Friday, January 3, 1896.

Mr. MEREDITH. I would like to suggest to my friend from Maine before this resolution is passed that some gentleman on the other side ought to prepare and have passed here a resolution to repeal that law which prohibits an old Confederate from entering the Army. I think this would be a pretty good time to do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the question be put on this resolution.

The question being put, the resolution of Mr. DINGLEY was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL MESSENGER FOR REPORTERS' GALLERY.

Mr. QUIGG. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be immediately considered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be appointed by the Doorkeeper an additional messenger in the reporters' gallery of the House at $1,200, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. This requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let us have the resolution again read for information.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. QUIGG. If I may have the indulgence of the House——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can address the House, with its consent, before the question is put on granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution. [A pause.] The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is offered at the request of the correspondents in the gallery. I will state the facts which, as it seems to me, justify the offering of the resolution and its adoption. By reason of the great increase in the number of correspondents and the additional rooms which they occupy, and the increased work imposed upon them, it is necessary, for a proper guardianship of those rooms and proper attendance, that a proposition of this kind be adopted. When the correspondents numbered 50, and the membership of this House was scarcely two-thirds as large as it is now, two attendants were provided for the reporters' gallery. There has been no increase in that number; and under the present exigencies the doors of the gallery are left constantly unguarded, and there is not sufficient attendance for facilitating the business of the correspondents or taking care of their rooms.

There are now nearly 200 correspondents in that gallery, and the request is for a third attendant. Before offering the resolution I conferred with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and I sought the concurrence also of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts. I have been unable to succeed on this point, whether from my fault or his I do not know, but I made diligent efforts.

The matter has been fully investigated, and there can be no doubt that this assistant in the gallery is urgently needed. I hope, therefore, the House will allow unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution, and that it will be adopted.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I am very sure there will be no disposition on the part of any member of this House to refuse to provide all the attendants in this service that may be required by the members of the press for their convenience and comfort. But inasmuch as there are now pending before the Committee on Accounts several resolutions providing for additional doorkeepers and messengers, it seems to be only proper that this matter should have the same consideration that is given to these other objects; and I most respectfully object at this time to the consideration of the resolution, and ask its reference to the appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT, LAW OF MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. MCLACHLAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to present a bill and ask unanimous consent to have it read and considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

To amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I object.

WOOL AND WOOLEN SCHEDULE, TARIFF ACT OF 1890.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a petition from the Association of Wool Merchants of Philadelphia, favoring the reenactment of the wool and woolen schedule (K) of the tariff law of 1890, sent to me for the purpose of having it made a part of the record; but I find that the same petition has already become a part of the record and content myself, therefore, with merely offering the petition at this time, and asking its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The petition will be appropriately referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COCKRELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Friday next.

By Mr. LAYTON: Resolution of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, demanding the immediate enactment of a bill giving full and adequate protection to the woolgrowers, etc., of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MEYER: Concurrent resolution of the general assembly of the State of Louisiana, in favor of improving the navigation of the River Bœuf and Bayou Macon, in northeastern Louisiana—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 2074—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MILLER of West Virginia (by request): Petition and exhibits of James M. Stephenson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. VAN VOORHIS: Papers to accompany House bill No. 2172, Fifty-fourth Congress, "A bill to muster into the United States service and grant an honorable discharge to Charles Edward Hawn"—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 19, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a draft of a proposed act to regulate the use of the public parks and improved reservations in the District of Columbia under the charge of the Chief of Engineers, and requesting favorable action upon the same; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. W. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2173) making an appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

The bill (H. R. 2173) making an appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill, after the second reading, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have sent for the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the present chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I had hoped the Chair would not lay the bill before the Senate until he returned. He will be here in a few moments, and I hope the Senator from Ohio will withhold his motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I looked around for the Senator from Alabama, and not seeing him here thought I would make the motion. But I have no objection to letting the bill lie over until he comes in.

Mr. COCKRELL. He will be here in a moment; and it will be understood that the motion will be called up as soon as he returns.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented the petition of George Hughes, of Portland, Oreg., praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition, in the form of a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of Sangamon County, Ill., praying for the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HILL presented the petition of George W. Armstrong, of Minetto, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation granting relief to the heirs of Capt. John Wood, late a soldier in the Revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (S. 238) to prohibit officers of the Government from refusing to pay moneys appropriated by act of Congress, reported it with an amendment.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Appropriations to report back favorably, recommending its passage, the House concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 20th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Friday, January 3, 1896.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is so advised.

Mr. CHANDLER. If in order I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to inquire of the Senator reporting the resolution whether it is reported favorably?

Mr. COCKRELL. I stated it exactly. The committee report the resolution favorably, and recommend its passage just as it came from the other House.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month, to report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 1055) to establish a bureau of military education and to promote the adoption of uniform military drill in the public schools of the several States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1056) for the relief of Joseph Tousaint; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1057) for the relief of C. J. Baronett, of Gardiner, Mont.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1058) providing for the increase of the Navy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. The bill in its general provisions follows the line of the act of last year, but it provides for a much larger increase of the Navy. I ask that it be sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I hope that committee will give it very early attention. It is an important subject,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 1059) granting an increase of pension to Louis C. Schilling; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1060) to pay the claim of James H. Sentz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1062) making an appropriation to enlarge the military post of Fort Meade, near the city of Sturgis, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1063) to establish a military post at or near the city of Pierre, Hughes County, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1064) to fix the pay of certain noncommissioned officers of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1065) in relation to a farm for the Indian training school at Pierre, S. Dak.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1066) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amount due the Flandreau Sioux Indians, and making an appropriation to pay the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1067) to provide for building and maintaining an Indian industrial school at or near Chamberlain, in the State of South Dakota, and at or near Rapid City, in the State of South Dakota, and to provide a farm in conjunction therewith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1068) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Indians residing upon the Cheyenne River Reservation, in South Dakota, for the purchase of a part of said reservation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1069) to increase the pension of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled from performing any manual labor, and, having one or more additional diseases resulting from the pensionable cause, who have to be under regular medical attendance at least one-half of the time, and that have drawn $30 per month for the past five years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1070) to increase the rate of pensions for certain cases of deafness; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1071) granting a pension to George Gamache; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1072) granting a pension to Frederick Andros; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1073) to aid the State of South Dakota to support a school of mines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1074) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain damages resulting to any person who made entry upon lands within the present limits of the Sequoia and Yosemite National parks, in the State of California, prior to October 1, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1075) for the relief of the heirs of D. Fulford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1076) for the relief of W. L. Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1077) for the relief of J. M. Montgomery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1078) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to cause to be made all necessary field examinations, surveys, and experiments for the purpose of demonstrating the extent, etc., with reference to irrigation, of the underflow waters between the ninety-seventh degree of west longitude and the foothills of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and making an appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1079) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1080) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Yankton, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 1081) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay from their own funds for certain legal services rendered the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokee Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 1082) for the relief of Irwin Tucker, postmaster at Newport News, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1083) for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1084) for the relief of Isaac Davenport and others, citizens of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1085) for the relief of the Potomac Steamboat Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1092) for the relief of Bvt. Lieut. Col. J. Madison Cutts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 1093) for the relief of Ruth Marshall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1094) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 1095) for the relief of Enoch Vernon, a citizen of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1096) to increase the pension of Wilbur F. Cogswell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1097) for the relief of Thomas J. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLICATION OF THE MESSAGES OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized to employ such clerical aid as he may find necessary in the copying, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, of the messages of the Presidents of the United States from the Journals of the Senate and House and the Executive Journals, for the printing thereof, and that the expense therefor be paid out of the appropriation for public printing and binding.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by the President's message to Congress of December 17, A. D. 1895, regarding the boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, it is made to appear that the contingency of war between the British Empire and the United States of America may suddenly arise; and

Whereas money is the first essential in times of war, and in such an event the Government uses gold, silver, and paper money indiscriminately until the two former disappear and thereafter relies solely on paper money: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, directed and instructed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether it would not be expedient and proper for the Government of the United States of America at this time to open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 1 to 16, and in addition thereto issue an adequate volume of full legal-tender Treasury notes in the same manner such notes have heretofore been issued, and, in the interest of national safety, withdraw the issue power of national banks and retire all bank currency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution. [Putting the question.]

Mr. PLATT. What is the vote?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One Senator has voted for the resolution and another Senator has voted against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Two voted for it. I voted "aye."

Mr. PLATT. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submitted to the Senate whether there was objection to its present consideration, and no objection being interposed he put the question on agreeing to the resolution. The Chair will again ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard it read. It is a simple resolution directing the Committee on Finance to inquire into certain mooted questions. I interpose no objection to it at all. These questions will be before the committee anyway. I have no doubt the subject-matter will be considered without the resolution, and therefore it is perfectly harmless.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the two "whereases."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, first, Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. Then I will object to its consideration at the present time.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The resolution will go over under the rule.

SUSAN WALLER.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Susan Waller, wife of John L. Waller, late an American consul at Tamatave, the sum of $1,500 for her necessary support and the support of her children pending an investigation into the legality and justice of said Waller's imprisonment under sentence of court-martial by the French army in Madagascar.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, referred, with the accompanying report, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, requesting the President, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all information which has been received by him or by the State Department in regard to injuries inflicted upon the persons or property of American citizens in Turkey, and in regard to the condition of affairs there in reference to the oppression or cruelties practiced upon the Armenian subjects of the Turkish Government; also to inform the Senate whether all the American consuls in the Turkish Empire are at their posts of duty, and if not, to state any circumstances which have interfered with the performance of the duties of such consuls," I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 19, 1895.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, which has been read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the bill read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The bill (H. R. 2173) making an appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the President, to investigate and report upon the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to enter an objection to the bill being read the second time to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been read for information.

Mr. PLATT. It has had its first reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read the first time.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska has objected to its second reading to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. It can not be read the second time to-day, except by unanimous consent. It has only been read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States, in considering a question of the gravity of this, of course ought to deliberate as long as it may find it proper and necessary in order to come to an absolutely correct judgment. I therefore would prefer that this bill should take the course indicated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which is the customary course with bills in this body, except in cases of extreme emergency, and that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations for consideration. But I should object to any reference unless the Senate agrees that we will have no holiday recess until that committee can make its report, after proper investigation, and bring the bill back before this body; for while I would hasten slowly in this matter, I would still make all necessary speed for the consideration of a question which is agitating the minds of the people of the United States and of the whole world. A delay might give opportunity for the formation of incorrect opinions as to our earnestness on this subject. Misfortunes might attend the formation of such an incorrect opinion in this country and in Venezuela and elsewhere in the world. I prefer that the deliberation which is necessary and appropriate on such an occasion should be given to this measure, but without unnecessary delay.

The wording of the measure as it comes from the House of Representatives leaves some question about the exact line of policy which the House indicates and intends to pursue in its action upon this question. That doubt is whether the Congress of the United States intends to intervene in this matter with whatever constitutional power it has and assume any control over diplomatic questions, and the formulation of the attitude of the Government of the United States toward Venezuela and toward Great Britain. There is some doubt left in this bill as to whether we intend to do that, or whether we intend to leave to the President of the United States the full and unembarrassed exercise of his constitutional power in forming and shaping a very important question for the future consideration of Congress in whatever form the President may see proper to submit it.

The divisional line between the exercise of these functions by the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States upon either hand is a clear one, and it is one that I do not care to cross by anticipation. I do not care to usurp, or appear to usurp, any of the functions, rights, duties, or responsibilities of the President by interposing the action of Congress so as to take out of his hands the proper treatment of any part of this matter.

We had an illustration in our recent history of the power of the President to appoint an adviser to be sent to a foreign country to collect information for the advice of the Executive in regard to a very delicate question existing between us and the Government of Hawaii. The President selected his adviser without the advice or consent of the Senate and sent him to a foreign country, and he came back and made his report to the President, which was laid before Congress. A good deal of debate, both in Congress and out of it, arose upon the question whether the President had the right, in virtue of his constitutional powers, to make that appointment and to charge Mr. Blount with the duties which he went on to execute and report upon. The subject was submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and they reported, not without dissent, however, that the President, under the precedents, a number of which were quoted, had the right to appoint such an agent to visit Hawaii to obtain information for his advice, so as to enable him to shape a diplomatic question between that country and the United States.

If Mr. Blount had composed a part of a commission authorized by an act of Congress and he had gone under the authority of that act to Hawaii and made whatever report he chose to make, the Congress of the United States would have become responsible for the action of Mr. Blount, because he would have been carrying out the will of Congress as expressed in a statute, and not the will of the President. That sufficiently indicates the question which arises in my mind as to the proper line of action to be taken in this instance. It is a question for the Senate to determine whether we shall in any wise interfere in this question legislatively for the purpose of giving any control or direction to the diplomatic features of it or the diplomatic attitude of the Government of the United States toward the question, or whether we shall leave it where, as I understand the President in his message desires it shall be left, in the hands of the constitutional Executive of the United States to deal with it as being still a diplomatic question.

I desire, Mr. President, to say that I think there is no difference of opinion between the President of the United States and Congress as to the promptitude with which this question ought to be settled. I believe that the President and Congress are in entire accord, that this question is one which demands the earliest settlement consistent with a deliberate course of action and a proper conclusion.

So far as the question which is called the Monroe doctrine is concerned, that is settled by the action of the Executive at least, and if we should pass this bill which comes from the House of Representatives in its present form, without any change, the conclusions reached by the Executive of the United States upon that question would be absolutely and unequivocally confirmed. I think that I do not mistake at all the sense of Congress upon this subject or the convictions of the people of the United States. The question of the application of that doctrine to the particular case in hand, the case of Venezuela, is one that is also, virtually, settled by the President's message almost as conclusively as the other, but it is not settled absolutely. He reserves for the consideration of the United States upon its own responsibility the facts relating to the attitude of Great Britain toward this boundary question in Venezuela and for the purpose of obtaining satisfactory information as to whether in this particular instance the Monroe doctrine is to be applied with all the force that the United States may see proper to exercise on any occasion in its enforcement.

It seems to me that the message of the President, and more particularly, I might say, the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Bayard, to be communicated to Lord Salisbury, puts this matter in such a clear, substantial, unequivocal light as that our action in affirming it in any form could never be mistaken. Our action in disaffirming it, if we should refuse an appropriation, of course, would reach back through the whole question, and would deny the existence of that feature of American law which we call the Monroe doctrine. But so far as the question of the Monroe doctrine itself is concerned, we have passed now to an attitude which I think must gratify this generation of men, and will be equally gratifying to all generations of Americans who may hereafter live—we have passed to that attitude in which we assert the right of the United States, as the controlling nationality on this continent, and the first and most responsible Government, for the republican form and principles of human government. That declaration has been made and will stand as the law of the United States if we pass the bill that comes from the House of Representatives, or any other bill executing the wish of the Executive as he has expressed it, or his recommendations upon this subject.

I am incapable, Mr. President, in any words that I can command, to adequately express my gratification that this question, which has been so long under debate, has at last received such a clear-cut definition, so substantially founded in truth and in justice and in American policy, and so rooted and grounded in the system of government which obtains in the United States—our republican constitutional form of government. I repeat, that I can never properly express my gratitude that we have arrived at a conclusion so entirely comporting with the dignity and honor of the Government of the United States, with its prestige among the nations, and with the sentiments of all the people of our country. At last we have attained to a ground by common consent, which is now being put into the form of legislative action, which fixes absolutely the attitude of the United States as to the existence of this question and as to the necessity of its enforcement in any and every case where it becomes material and practical.

If the Senate will indulge me just a moment, I will read a few extracts from the letter of Mr. Olney, in which, I think, the proposition I have just stated is very clearly laid down. I read these extracts from Mr. Olney's letter that there may be no mistake or question that we accept and adopt his definitions of the Monroe doctrine, as it is called, and the conditions that should call for its application.

In his letter to Mr. Bayard, he says:

> The important features of the existing situation, as shown by the foregoing recital, may be briefly stated.
> 1. The title to territory of indefinite but confessedly very large extent is in dispute between Great Britain on the one hand and the South American Republic of Venezuela on the other.
> 2. The disparity in the strength of the claimants is such that Venezuela can hope to establish her claim only through peaceful methods—through an agreement with her adversary either upon the subject itself or upon an arbitration.
> 3. The controversy, with varying claims on the part of Great Britain, has existed for more than half a century, during which period many earnest and persistent efforts of Venezuela to establish a boundary by agreement have proved unsuccessful.
> 4. The futility of the endeavor to obtain a conventional line being recognized, Venezuela for a quarter of a century has asked and striven for arbitration.
> 5. Great Britain, however, has always and continuously refused to arbitrate, except upon the condition of a renunciation of a large part of the Venezuelan claim and of a concession to herself of a large share of the territory in controversy.
> 6. By the frequent interposition of its good offices at the instance of Venezuela, by constantly urging and promoting the restoration of diplomatic relations between the two countries, by pressing for arbitration of the disputed boundary, by offering to act as arbitrator, by expressing its grave concern whenever new alleged instances of British aggression upon Venezuelan territory have been brought to its notice, the Government of the United States has made it clear to Great Britain and to the world that the controversy is one in which both its honor and its interests are involved and the continuance of which it can not regard with indifference.

So far, that is a statement of historical facts, which will be affirmed by the action of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives by whatever act may be passed here appropriating money in any form for executing this purpose on the part of the Government of the United States. So I accept it, and so I believe the Senate of the United States will accept it.

Again, the Secretary of State says in his letter to Mr. Bayard:

> There is, then, a doctrine of American public law, well founded in principle and abundantly sanctioned by precedent, which entitles and requires the United States to treat as an injury to itself the forcible assumption by an European power of political control over an American State.

Further on in the same letter he says, speaking of the attitude of Great Britain:

> Thus, as already intimated, the British demand that her right to a portion of the disputed territory shall be acknowledged before she will consent to an arbitration as to the rest seems to stand upon nothing but her own ipse dixit. She says to Venezuela, in substance: "You can get none of the debatable land by force, because you are not strong enough; you can get none by treaty, because I will not agree; and you can take your chance of getting a portion by arbitration, only if you first agree to abandon to me such other portion as I may designate." It is not perceived how such an attitude can be defended nor how it is reconcilable with that love of justice and fair play so eminently characteristic of the English race. It in effect deprives Venezuela of her free agency and puts her under virtual duress. Territory acquired by reason of it will be as much wrested from her by the strong hand as if occupied by British troops or covered by British fleets. It seems therefore quite impossible that this position of Great Britain should be assented to by the United States, or that, if such position be adhered to with the result of enlarging the bounds of British Guiana, it should not be regarded as amounting, in substance, to an invasion and conquest of Venezuelan territory.
> In these circumstances, the duty of the President appears to him unmistakable and imperative. Great Britain's assertion of title to the disputed territory, combined with her refusal to have that title investigated, being a substantial appropriation of the territory to her own use, not to protest and give warning that the transaction will be regarded as injurious to the interests of the people of the United States as well as oppressive in itself would be to ignore an established policy with which the honor and welfare of this country are closely identified. While the measures necessary or proper for the vindication of that policy are to be determined by another branch of the Government, it is clearly for the Executive to leave nothing undone which may tend to render such determination unnecessary.

Those statements in that letter, all of which are exactly in harmony with the conclusions I have just read, put this question in a settled form so far as our own attitude is concerned. They affirm that there is an American doctrine such as the Secretary of State has formulated and has argued and has proven, and that whenever that doctrine becomes applicable in a material way to the interests or the destiny of one of the American Republics the Government of the United States stands committed in its solemn declarations and, after this appropriation is passed, will stand committed absolutely by its legislation to the maintenance of that doctrine.

What, then, remains for Congress to do? According to the recommendation of the President, nothing more than to make an appropriation to enable him to execute his constitutional function of completing the inquiry and examination into the title of Venezuela and of Great Britain, so far as that may come under consideration, and of presenting that to the Congress of the United States in such a manner that our action in the proposed application of these doctrines to the case of Venezuela shall be certain and definite and may be based upon grounds that are sufficient.

I can understand, Mr. President, that a commission of three members, or five, or seven, or whatever number might be selected, might have some differences of opinion in regard to this question of the title of Venezuela; and they might unnecessarily interject those differences into the main question, and they might thereby dissipate a movement on the part of the Government of the United States which is intended to embody, and does embody, the sentiment and strength and feeling and determination of the whole people.

At least, our attitude might be rendered uncertain in some degree by what we might call a preliminary or collateral division in our councils or opinions. Notwithstanding I had formed a different opinion in the outset—I had not understood the exact purport of the President's message as I think I understand it now, that a commission to be organized under an act of Congress would be necessary to complete the work that the President has conducted so far—I now view the subject in a different light, particularly consulting, as I am glad to be able to do and desire very much to do, the wishes of the President in respect of the further dealing with this question. He says in his message to Congress:

> In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted, it will in my opinion be the duty of the United States to resist by every means in its power as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which after investigation we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela.

Here is an evident appeal by the President for the support, in whatever conclusions he may reach upon the facts relating to the Venezuelan title to disputed territory, of the judgment of persons to be appointed by him, upon a full examination of those questions, some of which are very delicate. I honor him for making that appeal, because it shows a deliberate purpose on the part of the President of the United States to proceed to the execution of these American doctrines announced as law in the letter of Mr. Olney, so far as they are applicable to the case of Venezuela, and to proceed in their execution, unless it shall turn out that, upon a full and fair investigation of the title of Venezuela to this territory, there is such a doubt about it that the American people should either take longer time to consider it or that they should abandon the intervention.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to have, if I can avoid it, and I do not think the country would like to see, any possible controversy or division of opinion between a high commission organized by Congress and the President upon any question presented in his message. Suppose that after this declaration and after this careful examination by Mr. Olney into the title of Venezuela, which he affirms upon the evidence now in reach, the high commission should find that Mr. Olney was mistaken in some of his conclusions, or that, after all, in their opinion or in the opinion of a majority of the commission, there was such doubt about the title of Venezuela that we could not afford to treat it as a subject that might possibly result in hostile collision with Great Britain, the President, if he did not concur in their report, might be antagonized by this commission, and the Congress of the United States having organized it, would, as a matter of course, have a right to their report and would be guided, to a degree at least, in their action by its recommendations.

We might find ourselves in a state of serious embarrassment in regard to the question of enforcing this American doctrine if we are guided by the report of a high commission, which, in its resultant effects, might uproot the doctrine itself, or might expose it to another half century or century of debate and discussion. I should like to avoid the possibility of such a result as that, and I would prefer that the Congress of the United States in this case, as it has in all other cases where we have had to conduct belligerent operations against foreign Governments, should take upon itself, in connection with the President of the United States, the solution of this question in an authentic form, and not leave its action to depend, in any degree, upon the judgment of a commission, who may not be wiser or better informed, after all, than the Congress itself or the President. It is the faithful research of the commission, rather than its recommendations, that we shall need, and that the President requests us to provide for.

I should dislike very much to be now compelled, after the firm advance we have made upon this occasion, to reverse our action so far as to leave this question in the hands of a commission to be organized by Congress for final decision. I prefer to leave it where the Constitution leaves it, in the hands of the President of the United States and upon his executive responsibility. He has not shrunk from the task. There is no indication that he will shrink from it. The arguments upon which his action is predicated are absolutely firm and sound, and they are right. If they could be wrong, they are still American. The President has adopted the American judgment on this question without seeking for precedents in monarchic Europe, and his attitude upon this subject, in my opinion, is that of patriotism, firmness, decision, and courage. He recommends speedy action, so that I can not mistrust that his object is to delay action or to so provide as not to bring this very exciting question to an early determination. There is not the least reason for anxiety or apprehension on that score.

I believe that the Senate of the United States would do well and would be thoroughly justified if we pass the bill just as it is and support the President and the "commission" by an appropriation of money. The word "commission" used in the bill is not a word which creates a commission by act of Congress. It is a word which merely indicates that persons are to be appointed by the President under his constitutional authority for gathering the proper information as to Venezuela's title.

Nevertheless, if there is an adverse opinion, or if what has arisen in the minds of Senators while they have been considering the question shall suggest to them the propriety of having the matter acted upon by a committee of this body, I am entirely willing that it should be done. But when that is done I shall be of the number who will enter, if it is necessary to enter, serious protest against any recess of Congress until the question is dispeopleof. Such a question can not be wisely or safely settled if it is settled too late. The anxiety of the world over the outcome of this great controversy is too great to admit of unnecessary delay on the part of Congress. And the questions are too seriously important to be presented to Congress by the Executive in any uncertain form through divided counsels. Let us vote the supply that is needed to gain correct information as to all the material facts involved in the case, and leave the right of untrammeled recommendation, as well as the undivided responsibility, in respect of these diplomatic questions, where it belongs under the Constitution, upon the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not disagree with the views expressed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and I heartily applaud the message of the President. Still, the question as to how we shall deal with the message is a matter for the consideration of the Senate. We are not to act hastily. Everyone, not only in this country, but in Europe, feels that the position taken by the United States in asserting the Monroe doctrine in a specific case is of the highest importance to all civilized nations.

In acting upon the measure submitted to us by the President of the United States I think we ought to proceed with deliberation. I think the bill as passed by the other House ought to be amended, it ought to be limited, it ought to be defined. There are several amendments suggested on both sides of the Chamber, which no doubt will meet with favorable consideration. There is no hurry about this matter. The controversy between Venezuela and Great Britain will not be settled in a day or in months. In my judgment it will be settled peaceably by the action of those two powers. Great Britain has too great a stake in the history of the world to attempt under the circumstances an act of injustice to a small country like Venezuela. The public sentiment of that country will be aroused against it. The generous sentiments of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen will be against robbing a small country like Venezuela of a portion of its territory. I have no doubt the question will be settled peaceably.

But the assertion of our right to prevent European powers from seizing any part of the American continents, from treating America as an Africa, to be conquered and divided among the various nations of Europe, can not be questioned. These continents are settled in every part by people of European and Christian races, and are controlled by them. The great nations of Europe are all interested in some part of America, England, however, having the greatest interest. She is in possession of a vast region north of the United States. Under the circumstances I do not expect that war will arise. I do not contemplate or wish to contemplate the possibility of such an event. I have seen enough of war in my time to dread its progress and its consequences. I do not wish in the slightest degree to say a word which would even indicate that a war is likely to ensue about this small matter; but at the same time I think the President of the United States is right, under the circumstances, in announcing what we understand to be our duty as the most powerful of American nations, and in saying to the countries of Europe, "These two continents are already occupied by Christian nations of Europe, and we, with our sixty-odd millions of people, are willing to say that the rights of those nations shall not be trampled upon by force and violence by European powers."

As a matter of course it is proper to say that we could not interfere in any agreement made between Venezuela and Great Britain as to the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela. I have a map here which shows better than any I have seen before the rapid encroachments made by Great Britain upon what is considered to be the territory of Venezuela. It shows that, beginning with a little colony derived from the Dutch, Great Britain added to it a large region of country lying to the west of it, and then gradually by encroachments has finally reached up almost to the Orinoco River. This is a serious controversy. Great Britain has taken ground that she will not even submit to arbitration as to anything on the south side of a particular line. Now, I think that the British people, when they understand this matter, when they see that it is attracting the attention of the civilized world, will not press their contention, especially when they remember that the Monroe doctrine was perhaps not so much the doctrine of Monroe as it was the doctrine of Canning, of England, then prime minister, which was agreed to by the United States and Great Britain, and that the power to prevent encroachment by European powers upon American territory or upon American States was asserted not only by the United States, but by the cooperation and consent of England.

I do not wish that this matter shall be postponed beyond the present session; I do not desire to create any delay, but under the circumstances I do think that the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which my honorable friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is chairman, and that it ought to be acted upon promptly and immediately. Let us hear and let that committee hear the suggestions of amendment that have been made. I could make some suggestions, and perhaps I shall make them. Let the suggested amendments be fairly considered. If they are voted down by that committee or by the Senate, or if the committee choose to take the House proposition, well and good. We will not resist it. But I insist upon the right of the Senate to consider so grave a proposition, and I am not to be hurried in that consideration. I wish to regard and treat the message of the President of the United States with the utmost respect, and I wish to reserve to the Senate the right of consideration, which we always claim. It is supposed that we are a slow-moving body. We ought to be. It is intended that the Senate of the United States should be conservative in all things. While this body should meet the duties of the hour, it should not too hurriedly adopt new ideas until they are strengthened into convictions. Then the Senate should act.

Now, in this matter, I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I believe that would meet with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who objected to the second reading of the bill. Let the committee be especially instructed to report to-morrow or any time that is necessary. Let the matter be there discussed. If the committee should report that no amendment is necessary, well and good. We will all vote for the bill. If they should report amendments, I have no doubt the House of Representatives would at once act upon them. Let us show no haste, no anxiety, but simply pursue the path of duty as it is laid out before us.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the question involved in the bill which has come to us from the House of Representatives. It seems to me that the proper course for the Senate to take on such an important matter is the usual course, to send the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, instructing them to report at once, if you please to-morrow, but not to act out of the usual line pursued by the Senate.

I do not think Congress ought to adjourn for the holidays until the House bill is disposed of. I have not the least desire to delay action. On the contrary, I wish to expedite it in every possible manner. But I think that the action which is taken by the Senate in its ordinary and usual way, after the report of a committee selected to deal with these subjects, would have far more weight and would more surely meet with the approbation of the American people than if we should hurry the bill through the Senate now without giving it that consideration which every bill ought to have from the appropriate committee. If the bill is sent to the committee it can be reported to-morrow. If it is impossible for the committee to report the bill to-morrow, then let the Congress of the United States remain here until they have disposed of it. Surely at this time Congress will not set the question of holidays against dealing with a matter which involves a principle on which are staked the interests and safety of the United States and the maintenance of which may result in hostilities between the two great English-speaking nations of the world.

Mr. President, for my own part I do not desire to put the slightest opposition in the way of the Executive or of the Senator who no doubt has represented the wishes of the Executive upon this floor. I cordially agree with the President's message. It is the right, the sound, the American position for the United States to take. But that which is of the utmost importance is that we should show to the world that we are united, without distinction of party or section, in support of the policy which the message outlines. We should be able to say, as Webster said in the House of Representatives, that our politics stop at the water's edge, and that when we come to dealing with a foreign question we deal with it simply as Americans.

It has been freely charged in the English newspapers published in London, and also in that small part of the British press which is published in the city of New York, that this is a matter of politics; that it is being used by the President for electioneering purposes, and that it has been used by the Republicans with that view. That is the most mistaken view ever uttered. The American people, without distinction of party, believe in the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine and are prepared to uphold it at any cost. They desire the appointment of a commission, not to act as a board of arbitration between one country and another, but to inform the United States on what line they ought to stand when they prepare to resist further English aggressions on American soil. The action of the commission is to be for our own information. It is, I think, wisely demanded. There is, however, no need for such a commission to go to Venezuela. It is not contemplated, in my judgment, by the Executive or the State Department. The utmost delay, therefore, that could possibly be caused would be by the necessity of sending experts to The Hague and to Madrid to get copies of papers and documents to which allusion has been made by Lord Salisbury and on which the English case apparently rests. Those papers would be necessary for the information of the commission. It would not take long to send such an expert to Madrid or to the Spanish archives at Simancas and another to The Hague. The methods of travel are now sufficiently rapid to enable them to go to both those points and get the required information in a short time.

I have no desire to limit the Executive in any way. He is acting on his high responsibility. The House of Representatives, overwhelmingly Republican, without a dissenting voice, upheld his hands. The Senate, I am sure, will do the same. But it is possible that we may desire still further to strengthen the bill, in order to show to the American people and to the world that we are not only united, but in absolute earnest; that, without any brag and without any bluster, we are prepared to maintain the Monroe doctrine, not as a principle of international law—I do not myself think it comes within the scope of international law—but as a fact, just as we maintained the Declaration of Independence, because we considered it vital to the interests and to the existence of this country.

There is, therefore, only one amendment that I should desire to suggest. I will give notice of it now, in case the bill goes over until to-morrow, or if it is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to be considered to-day and reported to-morrow, I shall ask that the amendment go with the bill to that committee. I desire to give notice of an amendment, that at the end of the bill, after the word "Guiana," the following sentence be added:

And said commission shall report with the least possible delay, not later than April 1, 1896.

I have given some attention to the Venezuelan question; I have studied it during the past year with a good deal of care; I have examined every map and document, I think, that is accessible here, and I think I know enough about it to say that there is nothing in the case that can not be considered within the period specified in my amendment, and that if there are papers to be brought from Madrid or from The Hague they can be brought within that time and laid before the commission. I think fixing the date will strengthen the hands of the Executive, and will give notice to the world that while we are proceeding deliberately and temperately we are also proceeding with absolute firmness; that we mean exactly what we say; that we propose to sustain the President in the position which he has taken, and that at a given time we shall be prepared for action in defense of the line reported as the true boundary by the commission. We want nothing indefinite about the commission. We want them to report as soon as possible, and then we will sustain the Monroe doctrine with all the strength of the Republic.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I can see no reason why action should not be taken at this time on the bill coming from the House of Representatives. I have listened carefully to the remarks that have been made. I know no need of further investigation as regards the bill, nor any reason why it should go over, and I hope the Senate will act upon it this morning. There are some suggestions that arise to my mind which I may be pardoned for making.

I am not contemplating war or peace. I am contemplating what is right in this case, as near as I know or can understand. We all understand that we have a very firm faith in what is known as the Monroe doctrine, and if anybody's faith has been shaken of late, if he will do as I have done, read the great dispatch of the Secretary of State, which was sent to Mr. Bayard last July, he will have no further doubt that our welfare and safety and honor and dignity all depend upon the strict enforcement of that doctrine. That dispatch will take its place alongside the best in American history, whether prepared by Webster, Madison, Jefferson, or anyone else.

In regard to the talk of haste, Senators seem to be desirous of relieving themselves of all suspicion of being in haste. I am not in haste, and they have not been in haste on the other side of the water, either. I have here the message of the President, and I hope the Senate will pardon me for calling attention to what I conceive to be the best statement that has been made or can be made of our attitude in this matter. Remember, Mr. President, that Mr. Olney's dispatch went to Mr. Bayard last July. It took them on the other side of the water five months to make up their minds what they would say in answer, or possibly whether they would answer at all. At last an answer came, as Mr. Cleveland well says, of a most unsatisfactory character. This is the case, however, that is made on our part. The President says:

In the belief that the doctrine for which we contend was clear and definite, that it was founded upon substantial considerations and involved our safety and welfare, that it was fully applicable to our present conditions and to the state of the world's progress, and that it was directly related to the pending controversy, and without any conviction as to the final merits of the dispute, but anxious to learn in a satisfactory and conclusive manner whether Great Britain sought, under a claim of boundary, to extend her possessions on this continent without right, or whether she merely sought possession of territory fairly included within her lines of ownership, this Government proposed to the Government of Great Britain a resort to arbitration as the proper means of settling the question to the end that a vexatious boundary dispute between the two contestants might be determined and our exact standing and relation in respect to the controversy might be made clear.

That is a magnificent statement of the case, just in all its parts, appealing to England to be a party to an investigation by arbitration, and to settle a vexatious boundary and avoid the possibility of collision hereafter. After five months of consultation among themselves Great Britain declined that fair and honorable proposition. For my part, I am willing to join issue with them on that subject, and, as a preliminary step, find out exactly what are their rights in that country and what ours are, and then stand by them.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is a little more magnanimous, possibly, or more generous than I am this morning. He says he has no idea that the great power, England, would attempt to put forth an unjust claim to territorial boundaries, or claim what did not belong to her. There is not a degree of latitude or longitude on the earth's surface on which she has not attempted to do exactly that thing. All around the globe she has been the oppressor of weaker nations and weaker peoples, and the very map which the Senator from Ohio held up from his desk refuted what he said. The very map shows that she has gradually been encroaching from one line to another, hoping to be unseen in it until from some 70,000 square miles, her original claim, she has over 100,000 square miles. She has by silent encroachment, and without any show of right or pretense, gone on and on from her original claim of the Schomburgk line, until now she has absorbed beyond her original claim more territory than there is in the great State which the Senator from Ohio in part represents, and much more than there is in the State which I in part represent.

Mr. President, I do not wish to talk on this subject any more than is necessary, but I do intend to go to the line of what I believe to be right. I have no fear of war. I look upon war as a horror, as other Christian men do, I hope; but there will be no war here. There is a hostage lying on this continent north of us. England will not fight on an issue of this kind. She does not dare to. The commerce of the world is carried in English bottoms, and I remember that in reading Mr. Canning only last year he stated an instance where, in the war of 1812, insurance was paid for at the rate of 13 guineas for £100 of commerce to cross the Irish Channel. And it was not six months after the war of 1812 broke out until armed privateers swarmed the ocean, and insurance shops were shut up in London. They would not insure the commerce.

No, Mr. President, there will be an adjustment and settlement, but it might as well be known now on both sides of the ocean that England's great colonizing career has to have some definite limits, some boundaries. Washington, in his Farewell Address, laid down the doctrine that we would not interfere with the affairs of Europe; and as a sequence they shall not interfere with American affairs. There is a logical sequence of the Farewell Address. Let us have that understood, and we will go on peaceably, but if England determines that she will fix her own boundaries in South America she can come up and with as much justification take the Mexican State of Chihuahua or any other one of those States, and plant her guns until they point over the American line; and inasmuch as she is in a foreign country from us and settling with that country, however weak or feeble it may be, we would have to stand still and look on. Such is not the doctrine of this Government, and such will not be the decision of the American people.

Without any intent to bluster about the matter at all, I think there has been time enough spent. It took nearly six months, as I say, for the British Government to send an answer, and then they sent us a declination to so just and wise a proposition as the communication of the Secretary of State contained, to arbitrate and settle the matter. Now, let us go forward and settle it for ourselves, so far as our responsibilities are involved. As the President says in his message, we will do this as a justification; he does not say of what, but there is a future implied there—as a justification of what shall come hereafter. Let us find out what their line is. Let them have what belongs to them and no more. I trust we may waste no more time on this great question. We should dispose of it and let the President appoint his commission and let the work go on.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I rise at this time simply for the purpose of making an inquiry. I understood the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to object to the second reading of the bill to-day. If that objection stands it will be a little more appropriate to have this discussion continued when the bill can be read the second time. I suppose the Senator from Nebraska desires to adhere to his objection.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I objected to the second reading of the bill to-day because I thought there ought to be some delay. There ought not to be hasty action on the part of the Senate. There can be no doubt in my mind that there is a unanimous agreement in the Senate upon the subject of the Monroe doctrine, and that no person misapprehends the force of that doctrine or what it is. But there is or may be a grave question as to the application of that doctrine in this case.

I look upon the question of the Monroe doctrine as settled, not by the declaration of President Washington, nor by the declaration of President Monroe, but I look upon it as a doctrine that is inherent in every nation that has and must maintain an existence. It is a doctrine of self-defense. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has illustrated it in his remarks. It is that doctrine which gives this nation the power to protect itself by prohibiting a foreign nation from acquiring territory upon ground that may be a menace to us. I am not disposed to enter into any dispute as to whether it is a national policy or an international law or a law of self-defense. In my judgment it is a law of nations because it is a law of self-defense, and certainly it is the policy of this Government.

Now, there will arise a question which this committee ought to consider, and consider well. The Constitution invests in Congress, not in the President, the power to declare war. The President is not invested with any power to declare war or conclude peace. It is a power vested in Congress. Are we to give the President power to appoint a commission without any approval upon our part after his selection of a commission to visit Venezuela or the disputed territory, or to sit elsewhere and acquire information upon this subject, and then are we to be called upon to act upon the report of that commission without ever having had the power ourselves of inquiring into it by a joint committee of Congress or a committee of either House? It occurs to me that that is a very important matter. I do not believe the Constitution of this country ever contemplated that the President of the United States should have that power. I think that when our fathers conferred upon us, through the Constitution, the power to declare war and conclude peace, they impliedly conferred upon us the sole power and the sole means of ascertaining the circumstances under which war should be declared and peace concluded.

I am not prepared to say that the President of the United States may choose men whom he may see fit, regardless of the attitude of Congress, and invest in them this high and delicate power. If the President has power or is given power to appoint this commission, one of the important things the Committee on Foreign Relations must consider is, whether the names of the commissioners should not be sent to the Senate for its consideration and approval before they receive their commissions.

I do not anticipate that there is any likelihood of war between Great Britain and the United States of America. When I have listened to resolutions introduced here, and bold declarations upon the part of Republicans and Democrats alike, and especially when I listened to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the effect that this matter should not be settled until the 1st of April, I have sometimes been inclined to believe that there was more of political warfare in the future between the two great political parties of the Union than there would be of warfare between Great Britain and the United States.

I shall insist upon my objection to the second reading of the bill to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. I rose simply to inquire of the Senator whether he intended to insist upon his objection, and I did that for the reason that I think the discussion would be more legitimate when the bill has been read the second time, as it has just received its first reading and has been read simply for information.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall insist upon the objection.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall probably make some remarks later on, after the bill has been read the second time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the probabilities of war. I regret the rather warlike tone of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. He even ventured to point out the direction in which England would find herself comparatively weak, and to indicate those considerations which would prevent her from declaring war or accepting our declaration of war. It is not wise to assume that either the great British nation or the great American people will refuse to fight in any imaginable contingency. People do not always fight when they ought. They do not always fight upon the very best of grounds. They are sometimes unjustifiable. They are sometimes ill tempered. They sometimes yield to an undue and oppressive ambition. I do not discuss the question of war at all.

But what do we desire here? Information. There is not a citizen in this Chamber, or the other, or in the United States, who would not be very glad, indeed, to receive to-day the careful report of five of our leading jurists or great legislators or diplomatists upon the merits of this question, its correct history from the beginning, boundaries successively established or claimed, and the correspondence that ensued between the different countries. Nobody knows what the facts are upon which we are expected to act. Great Britain herself does not know, I judge, by the map here issued by Venezuela, which gives six different boundaries that may be found upon British maps from time to time or in British demands, each one creeping northwestward. Now, if that is not a case for a commission, I do not know what can be.

I desire this matter to be referred to the committee because that is the dignified and deliberate and proper way. It is a method which will strengthen the case of the President and the case of the United States rather than injure it. If we proceed now in a very desultory discussion, such as is now going on here, to act upon this measure and accept the bill to-day exactly as it came from the other House, we shall be reproached with having departed from our usual course and with proceeding upon a supposed knowledge of facts, which knowledge does not exist. If we refer the bill to the committee, then various amendments which are in the minds of Senators on both sides of the Chamber can be considered that might otherwise take up days of debate.

If such amendments should be considered in committee, whether they be reported favorably or not, we shall be stronger before the world than if we pass the bill and concur literally with the action of the other House in the next fifteen minutes. I think it would be well for every man to state his amendment, if he has a suggestion in his mind, that the public also may see that this proposition to refer does not arise from any sort of disposition to make unnecessary delay.

I hope that the bill will be referred and amended. It might provide for a commission of five, to be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I hope that the appropriation may be made larger, and I hope that the time for the final report of the commission may be settled in the bill itself. I think those are important amendments. I know I am not alone here. I am not alone on either side of the Chamber in desiring the changes I have described.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the only contribution that I desire to make in the debate upon this question at this time is to ask to have read at the desk the paper which I send to the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read the paper given below.

Mr. CHANDLER. There are some three or four or five hundred names of members of the British House of Commons signed to the paper, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered, without objection.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I desire to request the Senator from New Hampshire to permit the letter of W. Randal Cremer to Senator SHERMAN, requesting the presentation of the memorial which has been read from the members of the British Parliament, to be inserted with the paper.

Mr. CHANDLER. To be printed with the document as read?

Mr. COCKRELL. To be printed with the document. I sent for the original papers at the time the Senator requested that the memorial be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish that that may be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The letter and memorial are as follows:

[From W. Randal Cremer, M. P., St. Paul's Chambers, 23 Bedford street, Strand, London, W. C.]

LONDON, January 1, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to forward you a copy of a memorial signed by 354 members of the British House of Commons. As the object of the memorial is of the highest importance, and the signatures represent all shades of political opinion in the British Parliament, I venture to ask for the prayer of the memorialists your earnest consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

W. RANDAL CREMER.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN.

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

In response to the resolution adopted by Congress on April 4, 1890, the British House of Commons, supported in its decision by Mr. Gladstone on June 16, 1893, unanimously affirmed its willingness to cooperate with the Government of the United States in settling disputes between the two countries by means of arbitration. The undersigned members of the British Parliament, while cordially thanking Congress for having, by its resolution, given such an impetus to the movement and called forth such a response from our Government, earnestly hope that Congress will follow up its resolution, and crown its desire by inviting our Government to join in framing a treaty which shall bind the two nations to refer to arbitration disputes which diplomacy fails to adjust. Should such a proposal be made, our heartiest efforts would be used in its support, and we shall rejoice that the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have resolved to set such a splendid example to the other nations of the world.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the controversy between Venezuela and Great Britain is one of long standing, of certainly at least fifty years. There does not seem to have been any established line between the section of country claimed by Great Britain and the Venezuelan territory—that is, no line recognized by both nations. The English Government has not adhered, if I am correctly informed, to the same line at all times. I have supposed myself that we practically knew where the original line was that they were entitled to hold by the cession of the country from the Dutch. I have discovered by the report of the President that that is in doubt. I do not think it becomes me, nor do I think it becomes any member of this body to discuss the question of fact. When the President of the United States says that the fact is not sufficiently well known in the Department of State to enable him to act without a commission or further information, I think in ordinary decency we have to wait. My private opinion may be one thing; my public opinion as a Senator in this body is another.

The President of the United States says that he wants a commission to determine facts. He has the power to determine facts without our aid, without reference to us; yet if he wants our assistance to get at the facts he is entitled to it.

There has been some surprise expressed, and a good deal of zeal and enthusiasm exhibited, over the message of the President of the United States. The President's message as a whole meets my hearty approval, but I expected it would. I did not believe we had reached a point in the decadence of national honor and pride where any Secretary of State or any President would retire from the American doctrine that has been so dear to the American heart for seventy years, called the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. President, it is not the Monroe doctrine; it is the American doctrine. It is a doctrine, as stated by one Senator here, that grows out of the doctrine of self-defense. It is not, as has been claimed by some, an international rule. It finds no support in international law except upon the principle which is grounded in all international law that the right of self-defense rests in every nation, limited only by its power. If we in this country believe that it is contrary to our interests and threatening to our institutions to allow colonies to be established upon the soil of the Western Hemisphere it is our right to say that they shall not be established, and we need not resort to international law for our defense; we resort to what has been the recognized law of Christendom for many years, upon which the balance of power is being maintained in Europe to-day, the right of every nation to see that no other nation aggregates to itself so much power as to threaten the peace and stability of others. We can defend the Monroe doctrine upon that principle without the slightest difficulty.

I do not understand that our great competitor in commerce and trade, our great English-speaking relative, has ever denied our right to assert and maintain the Monroe doctrine. What they claim is that the Monroe doctrine does not apply to this case. Whether it applies to this case depends upon the facts, which are unknown to us, it appears. If I knew what the facts were, as an international lawyer I would have no difficulty in applying the law. As a believer in the American doctrine of the right to say that no European power shall invade American soil, either of North or South America, I should have no trouble in coming to a conclusion. Is it an invasion of American soil? I do not know that. I repeat, I thought I did. I have found that I do not.

If the President of the United States had said that in the Department of State they had determined what was the true line between the British possessions and Venezuela, and if he had said, "We are confident that the British Government, instead of attempting to arrange a disputed line, is attempting to use this disputed line as a pretense for territorial acquisition," no matter what may be the character of the Administration, whether Democratic or Republican, I would have stood by that declaration as an American Senator, because there is where we get our information upon these subjects, and not from our own judgment. We must stand by what the Department says upon these great questions when the facts are ascertained by it.

The President says that he needs assistance to make this determination. We are going to give it to him. Nobody doubts that. The only question is, how shall we give it to him. I am as firm a believer in the Monroe doctrine as any man who lives. I am as firm a believer as anyone in the maintenance of the honor of the American people, and I do not believe it can be maintained if we abandon the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. President, there is no haste in this matter. The dispute is one of long standing. Great Britain is not now taking any extraordinary steps with reference to the control of the territory in dispute. They took, it is said, five months to answer our Secretary's letter of July 20. Mr. President, the time was not excessive. It is not unreasonable in diplomatic affairs that there should be months taken in replying to questions of so much importance. We may properly take months, if we choose, to consider it before we plant ourselves upon what we say are the facts in this case. I repeat, so far as the American people are concerned, the Monroe doctrine is not in dispute, is not in doubt, whatever may be the doubt about the facts in this case. If the facts are not ascertained, we must, before we proceed further, ascertain them.

This is a very important question. It is not a question of party politics. It is not a question that any political party ought to take advantage of to get votes. The political party that attempts to make capital out of this question will find that it is a loser in the end. The American people will not be trifled with on a question of this kind. If the other side of the Chamber, or the Administration, or anybody, attempts to make capital out of it, they will find that they will lose in the end, as we should lose on our side if we should be foolish enough, as I know we are not, to attempt to make capital out of it in any way.

The Monroe doctrine, or the American doctrine, grew out of the necessity of the case when the Holy Alliance was threatening the stability and the existence of the South American Republics, when it was the intent undoubtedly of the Holy Alliance, after they had isucceeded in disposing of some affairs in Europe, to take a hand in South American affairs. Then, not by the United States, but from Great Britain, came this doctrine. It was Mr. Canning who suggested it. It was, beyond question, Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, who enforced it upon President Monroe.

From that hour it has been the American doctrine, which no American Senator and no American statesman of any kind has dared to gainsay before the American people. We enlarged it in 1848 undoubtedly under Mr. Polk's Administration, but we had a right to enlarge it. Mr. Polk then laid down the proper law to govern us, and if it was an extension upon the Monroe doctrine of 1823 it was an extension growing out of the condition of the United States and the world, and a proper extension, and it has met the approval of the people of the United States from that hour to this.

The cherished doctrine is, not that we are the guardians of those Republics, not that we assume a protectorate over them, but that while a European Government may claim from them redress for injuries, it shall not claim that redress in a way which shall entitle it to territorial acquisitions from the offending State. That is the American doctrine.

We do not say to Europe that we will defend those States; that we will be responsible for their conduct. We say to all the European nations, if those States do not deal with you as one State should deal with another, you may go to war with them, if necessary, to enforce their national obligations toward you; you may demand of them disavowals, apologies, retractions, cash indemnities, if you choose; but you shall not take an acre of their land; not because we are interested so directly in those Republics, but because we are interested in this great Republic; because we feel that to maintain the integrity of those Republics—or, at least, if not to maintain their integrity as nations, to maintain their independence of European control—is essential to our prosperity. That is the reason why we adopted this doctrine, and that is the reason why the American people are ready to enforce it, no matter what it may cost. Mr. President, that is the feeling of the American people.

This question is of so much importance that I do not care myself if the bill goes to the Committee on Foreign Relations and lies there a month. You will not impress the world with our solidarity and solidity on this question by any haste in this body. Let this proceeding be a dignified proceeding. Let the bill go to the committee. Let the committee take their time on it. Let them return it here and say what is the best way by which we can strengthen the hands of the President of the United States in his efforts to maintain this American doctrine.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who want war. I do not believe in war. I believe in this case Great Britain made a great mistake when she said she would not arbitrate, and I have faith enough in the love of justice and right that pervades the people of Great Britain to believe that on second sober thought they will submit this question to arbitration, as many of their representative men have declared they are willing to submit all questions of this character.

Mr. President, I do not like to talk about war. We are, in my judgment, the greatest nation in the world. We have more force and power and strength than any other nation that flies a flag. We have a compact, homogeneous people, devoted to their institutions and country. But because we are strong and great we do not want to go to war unless there is a necessity and a demand for it, and when that necessity and demand arise we want to go to war with a sentiment back of us that will sink every dollar that we have and sacrifice every man in defense of the national honor and national right.

These are not, I repeat, questions to be kicked about and treated with haste. Let this bill go to the committee. Let it be considered. If the committee want a week, ten days, or two weeks, or a month, let the committee take it. Nothing will be lost. Great Britain will not misunderstand our attitude. She does not misunderstand it now. She knows just as well how we feel upon these subjects as she will when we pass this bill. She has had it dinned in her ears again and again from nearly every Secretary of State that we were not willing to abandon the Monroe doctrine, nor view with indifference the improper interference of any European power with any existing American Government, whether such interference is a violation of the Monroe doctrine or not.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal said of late about the Monroe doctrine, and I do not intend to expatiate on it. The Monroe doctrine has had repeated sanction by the American people and the American Government. In 1861, when war was flagrant in this country, when there was such a war in progress as modern times have not seen, when one-third of this country was arrayed against the rest, when we were threatened by interference by foreign powers, we were so attached to the Monroe doctrine that our great Secretary of State called the French and the English to account, and said, "Do you propose by your armies, which you are sending to Mexico, to dismember Mexico and make it a part of your European system?" Great Britain and France then, mindful of the great strength we had, and mindful of the strong hold that this doctrine had upon our people, said without the slightest hesitation, "We do not intend any aggrandizement of European countries by this proceeding. We are simply attempting to enforce a claim that we have against the Republic of Mexico." Then Mr. Seward said, "Very well; if that is the fact we will not now complain."

Suppose they had said, on the other hand, that they did intend to dismember Mexico, and partition it between France, Spain, and England, the three countries that were then invading it, we might not have been in a condition to have carried on a war, but we would have had the declaration made by the Secretary of State, and backed up by this Government then, that when the time did come that we could be heard, we would be heard in defense of the Monroe doctrine, at the point of the bayonet if it was necessary.

Later, as is suggested to me, our Army was gathered on the border of Mexico by command of Congress. Recently, in speaking with an officer who had taken part in the important battle where Maximilian was defeated for the last time, and where he met his final rout, this officer said to me that 2,000 Confederate Americans fought under the Mexican banner. He was a Prussian officer, had been an officer in the Confederate army, and he said but for our people, the Confederate army, Maximilian would have been triumphant in that battle. The Mexicans had our sympathy, they had our strong support, and when the French were notified by Mr. Seward that we still recognized and intended to recognize General Juarez as the constitutional President of that Republic they took their troops out of Mexico, because they knew if they did not it meant interference on our part and a war between France and the United States.

Later than that, when the Austrian Government was about to send to their prince reenforcements, the Secretary of State said to them, "If you do this we will not agree to longer remain neutral in this contest;" and they did not come. That was a direct assertion of the Monroe doctrine. It was an assertion that our Government meant to go to war if it became necessary in defense of that doctrine. I might give a number of instances of the recognition of this doctrine by our Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair reminds the Senator from Colorado that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the unfinished business will be laid aside informally, so that the Senator from Colorado may conclude.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. There are a number of instances which I will not detain the Senate by citing to show that the American Government has never for an hour departed from the principle known as the Monroe doctrine. Does anybody in Great Britain believe we are going to do it now? Does anybody in this country believe we are going to do it? Need we make any special demonstration of our adherence to that doctrine in view of our history in connection therewith? I think not, Mr. President. But if it should be done, it is not to be done by sending this bill to the committee in haste; it is not to be done by the passage of this bill out of the usual course; it is to be done by a declaration that will come from the American people so that it may not be misunderstood. That is what I should like to see done by this Congress and at this session. I should like to see this doctrine put beyond question hereafter, that we rely upon that doctrine and we mean to enforce it whenever there is a necessity for it, and we are to be the sole judges when that necessity arises. Great Britain, in this very correspondence, admits our right to maintain the Monroe doctrine, but questions the right to do it in this case, because she says it is not applicable to this case.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago that I was not in favor of war. I am not; I do not believe in it to settle controversies, and yet I know that sometimes a nation in defense of its honor and integrity must go to war. A war between the United States and Great Britain would be the most tremendous war of modern times; nay, I need not say of modern times—it would be the most tremendous war that the world has ever seen from the days of Alexander the Great to the present time. What would it mean? It would mean a universal war. Does anybody believe there can be a war between Great Britain and ourselves without bringing into that war other European nations? If they do, they have not studied the European question. We should not be, in the event of a war with Great Britain, without European allies. The interests of certain European countries would be not to let Great Britain dominate us. Their interests would be that we should destroy the prestige of Great Britain not only upon the sea, but upon the land.

Great Britain knows that; we know it; the world knows it. The great Russian Government, waiting patiently to get its rightful advent to the sea, would find an opportunity then that it has never before had. Do you suppose that Government would be slow to take advantage of it? Waiting to crowd down the line of British India, do you suppose the Russians would fail to take it? Waiting to complete the domination they have begun over China, do you suppose they would fail to complete it? They would move down through the Turkish waters to the open sea; while Great Britain was engaged in this enterprise with us they would have an opportunity to get that for which they have been striving for many years. Once secured, it never could be taken from them.

Mr. President, there is no danger of war, in my judgment, over a question like this. I do not say that if Great Britain should assert a principle that, if carried out, would be dangerous and distressing to us, we ought not to go to war, no matter what the consequences would be. In my judgment the consequences would be much more serious to Great Britain than to us; but I do not want to say that in the way of threat. I do not believe that is the way to discuss these questions. Neither Great Britain nor we could afford to go to war, except there were a great principle at stake, a great necessity for it. We should be derelict if we did. It would be the most inhuman thing in the world for these two great English-speaking peoples to go to war. Yet I would give my voice for war before I would see the country dishonored, and so would our English brethren if they believed it would be a dishonor for them to take certain steps.

I repeat what I started out to say, that there is no haste in this matter. It is a great big question, involving to some extent the peace and prosperity of the two greatest nations of the world. Let us approach it as statesmen and Senators; let us not be impatient; and, above all, do not let us be anxious, one to get the advantage of another in a political way. Too big is the question for party politics or party gain. Let this question be settled in such a way that when Great Britain sees what we have done she will know that there is a united nation back of it, and that we may have, as we ought to have if we go to war, the approval of the civilized world. We can not afford to go to war until we have that; and that, I am told, can not be had until the facts are officially and judicially determined. I am in favor of giving the President every method and every means he wants for that determination. When that determination shall be made, I shall be for acting in accordance with the honor and the dignity of the Government of the United States, without reference to what may be the result.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the debate so far has proceeded, of course, by unanimous consent, and I have no disposition in the world to check it. The question, as I understand, is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer this bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the bill has been read and it will go to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the absence of objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, no.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill has been read only once.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The second reading of the bill has been objected to, the Chair is advised.

Mr. MORGAN. The difficulty is that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] interposed an objection to the second reading of the bill to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill can not be referred until after it has had its second reading.

Mr. MORGAN. That, of course, prevents its reference to the committee, and prevents it from being read the second time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The second reading of the bill has been objected to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say to the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations who are here—and I will reach others by private notice—that I shall ask the committee to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. We have resolutions before us embodying all of this question, and have given to them some informal consideration. I believe that the committee will be prepared to come in to-morrow, if we have a meeting, with such suggestions as they may see proper to make, and the Senate without further delay can then proceed to action upon the bill.

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, if the order which has been pending is disposed of by the objection of the Senator from Nebraska, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the motion I entered to reconsider the vote by which the resolution which was under consideration yesterday was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEFFER. I suggest that there is a resolution on the table, coming over from a previous day, which I should like to have disposed of, which takes precedence of the resolution of the Senator from Florida. I do not think there will be any debate upon it, and I should like to have present action upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That resolution will go over under the rule, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not interpose any objection to the motion I have made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the motion submitted by him to reconsider the vote taken yesterday upon the passage of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the passage of the resolution as amended.

Mr. CALL. I now move to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

I will state, in deference to the general opinion of Senators that this resolution should be confined to an inquiry in the State of Florida, that I have so amended it. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of the efforts of corporations in the State of Florida, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congresss from the State of Florida or to influence the legislation of Congress; also to investigate and report to the Senate whether corrupt means, bribery, or free transportation have been or are being used to influence such elections in the State of Florida; also to inquire and report to the Senate whether the use of such influences or means is consistent with the preservation of the Republic of the United States and the rights and liberties of the people, and to report a bill for the punishment or suppression of such practices.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FAULKNER. I raise the question of order, for the Chair to decide, whether or not an amendment can now be submitted by the Senator from Florida which reverses the action of the Senate taken yesterday.

The resolution originally provided for a select committee of five. The Senate by a vote, which has not been at all changed by any action of the Senate to-day, amended that resolution by striking out a select committee of five Senators, and providing that the subject should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The amendment now offered by the Senator reverses that action already adopted by the Senate, and I raise the question whether or not the amendment is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say that the Senator from West Virginia can hardly be serious in raising this question of order. The vote by which the original resolution was passed having been reconsidered, the resolution is before the Senate. The Senator from Florida now proposes a new resolution differing from the former resolution by confining the scope of the inquiry to Florida. Therefore, it seems to me, the Senator from West Virginia must admit, the original resolution being before the Senate, that the amendment is strictly in order.

Mr. FAULKNER. No, Mr. President, I do not conceive it in that way. The motion to reconsider is simply to reconsider the resolution as amended. That brings the original resolution as amended by the Senate now before it. The amendment now offered by the Senator is to strike out the action of the Senate had on that resolution yesterday, and, for that reason, I suggest that it is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not mean to make any suggestions to the Chair, who probably understands this question. I should admit the point of the Senator from West Virginia if the Senator from Florida had simply moved his original resolution; but when he moves the original resolution with an amendment confining the inquiry to one State, instead of extending its operations over every State in the Union, it seems to me it is so different that it is entirely in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FAULKNER. I must state very frankly to the Senate that upon principle I am entirely opposed to the resolution. I do not see and can not conceive upon what authority the Senate have jurisdiction to go into an inquiry on this subject, which affects the interests of the States in the election of members of the legislature and also of the members of the House of Representatives, when it is not proposed to be done by a joint committee of the two bodies. In fact I do not think, so far as the Senate is concerned, that it has any power to investigate a subject which affects members of the House of Representatives unless there is a bill originating there proposing laws under the provisions of the Constitution to regulate the elections of members of the House of Representatives; and as to it affecting any question before the Senate, I can not conceive how any Senator can vote to sustain this motion who entertains the views which have always been expressed upon this side of the Senate. For that reason, and in order to test this question again, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CALL. The Senator can not displace my amendment by a motion of that kind. The amendment I offer is pending before the Senate, and he can not displace it by submitting a motion to refer the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would state to the Senator from Florida that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia is in order under the rules.

Mr. CALL. Then I hope that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia will not prevail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Is that a motion simply to refer the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to refer the resolution of the Senator from Florida to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CALL. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia will not prevail. I do not see why Senators can raise objections of this kind. The Senator from West Virginia knows very well that it has been the practice of this body, sustained by its rules, to obtain information upon which legislation shall be predicated. Now, when he says that this resolution affects the elections of the other House, that is not true. There is nothing in the resolution that concerns the elections of members of the other House. There is something that concerns the legislation which will require that corrupt methods shall be excluded from the elections of members of Congress. This distinction has been pointed out; it is broad, and there never has been any idea anywhere that Congress could not obtain information by a committee for the purpose of formulating laws upon a subject over which it had jurisdiction.

Does the Senator mean to say that Congress has no jurisdiction over the question of the purity of elections to this body; that that is not a subject upon which we can make laws forbidding fraud, bribery, or corrupt practices, the influences of money in corporations, and the times and manner in which elections shall be held—this in the very words of the Constitution?

It is evident that there is no force in those objections. This resolution was objected to because it opened the door of inquiry in other States where there was no allegation that there were any practices of this kind, and I have amended it so that it meets the views of Senators who urged that objection. I know that the Senator from West Virginia does not desire to cover up influences of wealth and money corruptly used in elections, and therefore he ought not to kill this resolution by seeking to refer it to a standing committee.

I am not attacking any man or any set of men, but to say that there can be no legislation by the Congress of the United States to require that the people of the United States shall have their rights and have their elections for members of Congress conducted fairly, honestly, and properly, that the influences of great accumulated wealth shall not be permitted to control the elections, is to me a most extraordinary proposition.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I do not propose to submit for one moment in silence to an imputation or suggestion from the Senator from Florida that I am in favor of concealing anything or preventing any investigation in reference to corruptions in elections. I have known none by corporate power or aggregate wealth in my State, I am proud to say. I do not know whether such exists in other States of the Union; but I am not to be deterred from the exercise of what I consider to be a right and a duty devolving upon me as a Senator here, by any suspicion, threat, or insinuation of that character. There is a principle involved in this question, a principle to which I am wedded, a principle for which I have fought since I have been in the Senate, and which I do not intend to surrender simply because of my courtesy to the Senator from Florida.

This whole country is proud of the fact that to-day not a single Federal election law stands upon the Federal statute book affecting the rights and the control of the States in reference to their elections, not only for the members of their legislatures, but even for members of the other House of Congress; and yet here we have a resolution presented by the Senator from Florida for the appointment of a special committee to investigate corruption in elections in the States, and authorizing that committee to report by bill or otherwise, to provide, as he said in his closing remarks, as to the mode and manner of voting in the States at these special elections, not only to cover elections of members of the House of Representatives, but the purity of elections of members of the legislature. Sir, I am not ready to go to that extent. I do not believe that the American people are ready to reverse the action of the Fifty-third Congress when they wiped from the statute books of the Federal Government every single item of legislation in reference to the control by the Federal Government of State elections. For that reason I have made this point; for that reason I intend to persist in it, believing that it is in accord not only with the view of this side of the Chamber, but with the view of the American people. It means peace; it means leaving to the local communities and the State governments the control of the elective franchise, and delegates, as it properly is delegated, to the State authorities to see to the purity of the elective franchise in those States.

What is the object of this special committee? It is said in the latter part of the resolution it is to bring in a bill here in reference to the elections in the States. There is no question before the Senate affecting the purity of any election in any State involving the title of a United States Senator, and, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], there is no authority in this resolution to summon persons or to bring any of these questions before the committee by evidence under the authority of the Senate, because if it contained a provision of that kind the Senator knows that the resolution would have to be referred to a committee of the Senate known as the Committee on Contingent Expenses. Therefore he avoided making any such provision. But if this committee is created those Senators who vote in favor of the resolution will be in honor bound to vote for any appropriation necessary to carry it out. If the committee is empowered to make this investigation and subsequently to formulate a bill to carry out their views in reference to elections in the States, it will be obligatory upon those who indorse this policy to give to that committee all the means necessary for the accomplishment of the objects and purposes contemplated by the resolution.

For these reasons I renew the motion that the resolution, with the amendments of the Senator from Florida, be referred to a standing committee of this body, so that it may report upon the propriety of again entering into the policy of enacting Federal election laws covering the several States of this Union.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, in the first place, I wish to correct the statement of the Senator from West Virginia. There is nothing in the resolution about the election of members of the State legislatures. There was nothing said in my closing remarks about that subject. If this committee is appointed it will report to the Senate whether it is advisable or not, whether it is constitutional or not, that there should be such legislation.

The Senator from West Virginia contradicts himself when he proposes to refer a resolution which he says contemplates an unconstitutional act to a standing committee of this body to report whether it be advisable or not to have legislation upon the subject. If it be unconstitutional, it ought to have no reference here except to the Judiciary Committee to ascertain and report whether it be constitutional or not. But the argument of the Senator from West Virginia requires the conclusion that if it is proved that the influences of corporate power, of a few men owning three thousand millions of property of this country under its public policies in the form of franchises, which carry with them a power of taxation of the people, shall control the elections of this body, that there is no power in the Government of the United States to prevent it. That is the proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. FAULKNER. Do I understand the Senator from Florida to say that I made that statement?

Mr. CALL. Not that the Senator made the statement, but that his proposition demands that he should occupy that position.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CALL. Certainly I will.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then, as I understand the Senator from Florida, it is admitted upon his part that there is not sufficient power in the States to secure purity of elections in this country.

Mr. CALL. It is a statement on my part that the States should be aided by proper legislation here in restraint of corporations, and that if it is not done, the destruction of private property in these franchises will inevitably occur.

I do not mean that it shall be implied from my remarks that the Senator is in favor of such a proposition. I do not doubt that he is a true and loyal friend of the Republic, as much so as I or any other person, but that his proposition logically demands this consequence.

When there are fifty men owning three thousand million dollars of the property of this country, and 17,000,000 people with less than $300 income, the former, by the use of the great power derived from franchises, controlling the elections of this country, if the Senator means to say that the States and the people should not be aided by legislation to prevent that evil, he makes an issue which I gladly accept with him. It is not a question whether the States have power or not. It is a question whether the whole power of corruption should be brought upon the States, some of them small, some of them with a small population. It is a question whether the whole power of this immense wealth and the million of employees should be brought to bear against the masses—against the people.

Does the Senator mean to say that he does not perceive that throughout the country there is great agitation among the workingmen and the people upon these subjects? Does he mean to say that there should be no restraint exercised by Congress upon the use of bribery and corrupt practices? If so, this Government is powerless, and may at any time be displaced by a combination of the fifty men possessed of the entire wealth of the nation. We all know that it is claimed that those influences do exist. What, then, is the objection to legislation which shall forbid, in conducting the interstate commerce of the country, these corporate powers, whether by subordinates or by principals, from interfering with the right of the people to govern themselves? The States alone have power, says the Senator.

Mr. President, I am as strongly in favor of protecting the autonomy of the States and the just rights of the States as anyone else, but when legislation is proposed which does not impinge upon those rights, but relates to great public questions like these, why should the question of State rights be introduced? State rights for what? To sacrifice the people of the States; to prevent the people of the States from having their constitutional rights. I do not accept such views. I do not ask for a Federal election law. I ask for an investigation of the facts relating to the question whether corrupt influences have been used and are being used to control the elections of this country by a few men, and whether that is or is not consistent with the preservation of our republican government. I ask further that the investigation be confined to a State where the people are almost unanimously of that opinion, and where they are striving with difficulties which it is very difficult for them to overcome.

I believe this investigation is desired by men of all political parties in the State of Florida, who believe in a government of the people and who desire the continuance of the Republic and the institutions established under our Constitution and form of government.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WALTHALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, December 20, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 20, 1895.

Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., the Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

O, Thou who art the King of kings and Lord of lords, as the time draws nigh the birth of Christ inaugurated by the angel song, Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men, we pray that the spirit of the season may enter into our hearts and minds and keep us in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son Jesus Christ, our Saviour.

Forbid that the two foremost nations of the world which bear the name of Christ, with one language, one faith, one baptism, one Lord, should be embroiled in war in all its horrors and barbarisms. Grant, we beseech Thee, that we may be saved from imbruing our hands in each other's blood. Endow our rulers, the rulers of both nations, and the kindred people of the two lands, with such wisdom and the spirit of justice and magnanimity that all differences and difficulties may be amicably and righteously settled, and that God's name may be glorified in the establishment of concord, amity, brotherly kindness. So may this become an august and memorable Christmas in the history of the English-speaking world and of the whole earth; so let health, prosperity, brotherly kindness, and charity pervade all our land and our motherland, and God be glorified, and the reign of Jesus Christ, our Saviour, established. We humbly pray in His sacred name. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent that the invocation of our Chaplain this morning may be spread at length in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Journal stands approved.

THE BOARD OF IRRIGATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th instant, the report of the Board of Irrigation, relative to its organization, the existing legislation relative to irrigation, a list of official publications on irrigation, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. KYLE, was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in accordance with the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, the ninth annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which, with the accompanying report and a statement of appropriation and expenditures, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes relative to ports of entry; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PEFFER presented the petition of J. G. Wait and sundry other citizens of Sturgis, Mich., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that the election of President, Vice-President, Senators, and judges of the Supreme Court be made by a direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the reenactment of Schedule K of the tariff act of 1890, relating to duties on wools and woolens; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a petition of the pastor and congregation of the Emanuel Presbyterian Church of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for prompt action by the Government of the United States to prevent further outrages in Armenia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of the Central Wyoming Wool Growers' Association; of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa.; of the wool merchants of Philadelphia, Pa., and of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Wool Merchants' Association, praying for the reenactment of that portion of the tariff law of 1890 known as Schedule K, relating to wools and woolens; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of the regent and members of the Roger Sherman Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New Milford, Conn.; the petition of the regent and members of the Elizabeth Clark Hull Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Ansonia, Conn.; the petition of the regent and members of Abigail Phelps Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Simsbury, Conn.; the petition of Miss Susan Billings Meech and 91 other citizens of Groton, Conn.; the petition of William Price and 102 other citizens of Connecticut; the petition of Addie Avery Thomas and 35 other citizens of Connecticut; the petition of Harriet E. Noyes and 12 other citizens of Stonington, Conn.; the petition of Frank B. Carver and 119 other citizens of Connecticut, and the petition of the regent and members of the Anna Warner Bailey Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Connecticut, praying that the United States purchase certain lots adjoining old Fort Griswold, in the town of Groton, Conn.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented the petition of J. G. & I. N. Day, of Washington, D. C., contractors for the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, Oregon, praying that compensation be granted them by reason of expenses occasioned by the extraordinary high water of 1894 in that river; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vancouver, Wash., praying that an increase of pension be granted James McCormick, a resident of that vicinity; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., and of the Board of Trade of Ardmore, Ind. T., praying for the enactment of a town-site law at the present session of Congress in the interest of various towns in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CORTHELL'S LECTURE ON ISTHMIAN ROUTES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have a copy of a lecture delivered by Mr. Elmer L. Corthell, a distinguished and eminent civil engineer, upon the Isthmian routes. It contains valuable data, statistical and geographical. It is not very long, and I ask that it may be printed as a miscellaneous document. There are some plates that will be furnished to the Public Printer, so that there will be no expense, except simply the typesetting of the lecture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPRINT OF DOCUMENT ON THE VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 6,000 extra copies of Senate Document No. 226, first session Fiftieth Congress, relating to the Venezuela boundary, be printed in paper covers, of which number 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GORMAN. Some days since the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] offered a resolution which was adopted by unanimous consent, authorizing a reprint of this document, and a similar resolution was passed in a coordinate branch. Under the printing law the Public Printer is unable to execute the order of the Senate because the cost exceeds $500, and therefore this concurrent resolution is necessary. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1098) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. George Rogers Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1099) granting a pension to Elijah Drake; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1100) granting a pension to Russel N. Reynolds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1101) granting an increase of pension to Manon Van Gordon; which was read twice its by title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1102) for the relief of Lorenzo Thomas, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 1103) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1104) for the relief of the estates of Hugh McDonald, deceased, and Elijah Moseley, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committeeon Claims.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 1105) granting a pension to Mary E. Sessions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1106) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1107) for the relief of acting assistant surgeons; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1108) granting a pension to the widow of Gen. John Newton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 1109) granting a pension to Jennie Leninhen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1110) fixing the times for holding the circuit and district courts of the northern district of Iowa and of the southern district of Iowa; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GEAR. I wish to say in explanation of this bill that its provisions have been agreed upon by the Federal judges in the State of Iowa, and they would like early action upon it. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I request the committee to report it back as soon as possible.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1111) to purchase a bust of Gen. Philip H. Sheridan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1112) for the relief of J. F. Bailey & Co., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 1113) appropriating money for the payment of the claim of the Western Paving and Supply Company for paving with asphalt streets adjacent to United States court-house and post-office building in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1114) appropriating $4,323.15 in payment of claim of A. Brewer, of Indianapolis, for constructing sewer adjacent to the lands of the United States in city of Indianapolis, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1115) granting a pension to Sarah Potter, dependent daughter of Andrew Potter, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1116) to grant a pension to Martha Noble Brainerd; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 1117) granting a pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 1118) for the relief of homestead and preemption settlers on even-numbered sections within the limits of railroad grants; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1119) granting an increase of pension to Peter Daly; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1120) for the relief of John W. Lewis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1121) for the relief of J. G. and I. N. Day; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1122) for the relief of Sally Hardmond; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 1123) for the relief of Mirilla Sherman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1124) granting an increase of pension to Alfred B. Simpson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1125) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah H. Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1126) granting an increase of pension to Leonard Tigchon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1127) granting an increase of pension to Russell R. King; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1128) granting a pension to Isabella Morrow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1129) for the relief of Joel N. Sanford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1130) for the relief of B. J. Van Vleck, administrator of Henry Van Vleck, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a bill, prepared in the office of the Attorney-General, which has been sent here. It relates to a subject of very great public importance, and I should like to have it read at length, in order that it may go into the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1131) relating to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the court of appeals of the District of Columbia is hereby given jurisdiction over any and all suits that may be brought by the United States to enforce or obtain other relief upon any lien or liens on any railway or railways, or on any property belonging to one or more railway corporations, wherever such property may be situated.

SEC. 2. Separate liens upon different railways or railway properties may be enforced by the United States in the same suit when such railways constitute or were intended to constitute together a through line, or a part of or connected with a through line or general system of railways. The court shall have power to make such orders concerning the sale of said property as may be just and proper for the protection of the interests of all parties concerned.

SEC. 3. Said court shall have power to issue process, mesne and final, which shall run into any district and be served as other like process by the marshal of such district, and to enter all proper orders, decrees, and mandates, including orders, decrees, and mandates for the payment to the United States of any deficiency arising upon a sale under such lien.

SEC. 4. Holders of liens on any such railways or property may be made parties to such suit, or may intervene if not made parties, and said court may order any and all proceedings by any party or parties in other courts having jurisdiction of part only of the property involved to be discontinued or stayed until the termination of such suit by the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 1132) to establish a national university; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee to Establish the University of the United States.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1133) to establish postal savings banks and to encourage the saving of money in small amounts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1134) to establish an assay office in the city of Deadwood, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PUGH. I have received two bills from the Attorney-General embodying the recommendation made in his annual report. I introduce the bills, and ask that they be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The bill (S. 1135) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 1136) in relation to suits against railroad corporations in Federal courts was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. Let the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no suit to foreclose a lien upon property of any rail road corporation shall hereafter be brought in any Federal court except in the district in which the principal operating offices of such corporation are located: Provided, That a lien upon property wholly located in any one district may be foreclosed by suit in that district.

Second. That no receiver of the property of any railroad corporation shall hereafter be appointed by any Federal court except in the district in which the principal operating offices of such corporation are located; and a receivership so constituted shall extend without further order, except so far as the appointing court may direct to the contrary, to all property of such corporation within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States; and such court shall have sole jurisdiction to settle his accounts and to direct his proceedings.

Third. That if more than one Federal court shall hereafter appoint a receiver or receivers for the same railroad corporation, claiming jurisdiction under this act, any party interested, or any one of said receivers, may apply to the Chief Justice of the United States, or in case of a vacancy in said office, or of his absence from the country or inability to act, to the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court, for an order determining which of said appointing courts had jurisdiction. The justice so applied to shall direct what notice shall be given of the application, and shall hear and decide the same as a motion, and his order deciding the same shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the court which first appointed a receiver; and until the filing of said order the receiver or receivers first appointed shall have charge of the property of such corporation temporarily; but said order, when filed, shall operate as a final and unappealable determination of said jurisdictional question.

Mr. BRICE. I present a communication from the Attorney-General accompanied by the draft of a bill relating to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. I introduce the bill, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 1137) relating to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1138) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Gen. Zachary Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1139) granting an increase of pension to A. S. Lowdermilk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That W. D. Sigler have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate, and that they be given to Hon. C. N. Clark, a Representative from the State of Missouri.

DEDUCTIONS FROM SALARIES OF CLERKS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether there is a practice in the Post-Office Department, or any branch or line of its service, of deducting from a clerk's salary at the end of the month pay for such offenses as missending a registered package, carrying mail past its destination, or failing to sign a register at terminal points; and if so, to what extent this practice has been carried on, and what aggregate sum of money, if any, is now in the Post-Office Department arising from this practice; and also by what authority such deductions are made.

DUTY ON WOOLS.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table. I give notice that at an early date I shall ask the Senate to take it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks in support of the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to incorporate into any bill for raising revenue which may come to that committee from the House of Representatives at the present session the following provisions, either as a substitute or as an amendment, and report the same to the Senate at their earliest convenience:

All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the three following classes:

Class 1: that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of Merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not hereinafter described or designated in classes 2 and 3.

Class 2: that is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

Class 3: that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and including all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal custom-houses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classifications of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the authority to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other custom-houses of the United States when they may be needed.

Whenever wools of class 3 shall have been improved by the admixture of Merino or English blood from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal custom-houses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty either as class 1 or as class 2, as the case may be.

The duty on wools of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed; and the duty on wools of the first and second classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed.

Unwashed wools shall be considered such as shall have been shorn from the sheep without any cleansing; that is, in their natural condition. Washed wools shall be considered such as have been washed with water on the sheep's back. Wool washed in any other manner than on the sheep's back shall be considered as scoured wool.

The duty upon wool of the sheep or hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, or which shall be changed in its character or condition for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt, or any other foreign substance, or which has been sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject: Provided, That skirted wools as now imported are hereby excepted. Wools on which a duty is assessed amounting to three times or more than that which would be assessed if said wool was imported unwashed, such duty shall not be doubled on account of its being sorted.

If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act imported as of any specified class, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of any specified class, shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty than the class so specified, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the highest rate of duty chargeable on wool of the class subject to such higher rate of duty, and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

The duty upon all wools and hair of the first class shall be 11 cents per pound, and upon all wools or hair of the second class 12 cents per pound.

On wools of the third class and on camel's hair of the third class, the value whereof shall be 13 cents or less per pound, including charges, the duty shall be 32 per cent ad valorem.

On wools of the third class and on camel's hair of the third class, the value whereof shall exceed 13 cents per pound, including charges, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem.

Wools on the skin shall pay the same rate as other wools, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

On noils, shoddy, top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, garnetted waste, and all other wastes composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty shall be 30 cents per pound.

On woolen rags, mungo, and flocks the duty shall be 10 cents per pound.

Wools and hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animals, in the form of roping, roving, or tops, and all wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this act, shall be subject to the same duties as are imposed upon manufactures of wool not specially provided for in this act.

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the foregoing section be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a statement showing, during each of the last five years, and for the whole period, the gross amount of the imports from ports of Great Britain and her colonies and dependencies, together with the amount of the exports to such ports; also the number of entries of British vessels into American ports, and, if readily ascertainable, their gross tonnage.

IRRIGATION INTERESTS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to furnish such information as may be had in their respective Departments concerning the existing legislation relative to irrigation as far as it concerns the Executive Departments, the operations of each bureau and office in any way concerned with irrigation, the principles which govern the subdivision of work among the various offices wherever the law allows latitude, and such other facts as will serve to show clearly what has been already accomplished and what is proposed to be accomplished in this line.

FUNERAL OF ISAAC BASSETT.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Vice-President shall appoint a committee of seven Senators to attend the funeral of Isaac Bassett, late assistant doorkeeper, at half past 2 o'clock Sunday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as the committee under the resolution Mr. GORMAN, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. PEFFER, Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, and Mr. ROACH.

RAILROAD TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas, coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. PEFFER December 18, 1895; and the Senate proceeded to its consideration:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether the principal railroad companies acting as common carriers of interstate traffic between the Western States and the Atlantic Seaboard have secretly entered into an agreement to frame a joint traffic association; and if so,

Second. What companies have joined said agreement or have included their traffic therein, and by what individuals said agreement is signed, and what is the amount of the capitalization of each and all of said companies and the mileage thereof.

Third. Whether said agreement binds each company to make and enforce such rates or fares and freights as may be prescribed by a board of officers representing all the companies joining the compact.

Fourth. Whether the agreement provides for collecting from every company a money penalty of $5,000 in each case of violation of such stipulation to make and enforce rates, or a money penalty equal to the gross receipts of the transaction constituting such violation, which money penalty is to be applied for the benefit and to the uses of all the companies except the one offending.

Fifth. Whether said agreement constitutes a combination in restraint of trade and commerce under the existing laws of Congress, or is a violation of the interstate-commerce law.

Sixth. Whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power, of their own motion, to investigate such agreement, and whether or not the same, if unlawful, is subject to arrest by process for temporary injunction, or how otherwise the signers thereof may be proceeded against.

Seventh. What action, if any, has been taken by the Commission or by any other tribunal or officer of the Government with respect to said agreement. And in addition the Commission will transmit to the Senate all correspondence, complaints, and other documents in possession of the Commission concerning said agreement, and the action of the Commission in relation thereto.

Mr. PEFFER. I move that the resolution be amended in the fifth line by striking out the word "secretly" and inserting the word "recently;" so as to read, "have recently entered into an agreement," etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN December 19, 1895; and the Senate proceeded to its consideration:

Whereas by the President's message to Congress of December 17, A. D. 1895, regarding the boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, it is made to appear that the contingency of war between the British Empire and the United States of America may suddenly arise; and

Whereas money is the first essential in times of war, and in such an event the Government uses gold, silver, and paper money indiscriminately until the two former disappear and thereafter relies solely on paper money: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, directed and instructed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether it would not be expedient and proper for the Government of the United States of America at this time to open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 1 to 16, and in addition thereto issue an adequate volume of full legal-tender Treasury notes in the same manner such notes have heretofore been issued, and, in the interest of national safety, withdraw the issue power of national banks and retire all bank currency.

Mr. PLATT. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think that this resolution ought to be adopted by the Senate without being sent to the Finance Committee, because it is in the nature of an instruction to the Finance Committee; and therefore the Senate ought to express its views with reference to the matters contained in the resolution before the Finance Committee receives it.

A few days ago we received from the President of the United States a message regarding the controverted boundary line between British Guiana and the Republic of Venezuela. In that message the President of the United States said to us:

Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. The inquiry to that end should of course be conducted carefully and judicially, and due weight should be given to all available evidence, records, and facts in support of the claims of both parties.

In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation, and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela.

This, Mr. President, is no more nor less than a revamp of what is known as the Monroe doctrine, expressed in no better language than it was expressed by President Monroe. It is a doctrine that is as old as nations themselves. It seems to me that it is impossible to conceive of the existence of a nation without at the same time conceiving of the right of that nation to protect its life and its autonomy. It is a law of nature. It is a doctrine that is coexistent with the oldest nation upon the face of the earth; it is a doctrine that is found in nature everywhere. It is the same characteristic that is found in the individual; it is the doctrine of the right to preserve one's self; the doctrine of the right of a nation to preserve itself. It is not a new doctrine, and ought not to be misunderstood.

I can conceive of no particular cause for the delivery of this message to Congress. There does not seem to have been any immediate demand for it, and it occurred to me at the time that the President of the United States, having lost the confidence of the people of this country to some extent during his Administration of the last two years and nine months, sought to restore himself and his party to the confidence of the people, and by that means induce them to forget their grievances and the prostrate condition of the country.

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], laboring no doubt under a sense of great obligation to the President for his splendid services in the campaigns in New York in 1894 and 1895, and perhaps actuated somewhat by the splendid services of the President in the campaign in Maryland in 1895, and the magnificent services of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury in the campaign in Kentucky this year, felt as though it was perfectly proper for him to introduce a bill here for the release of all of the ex-Confederates from the disabilities under which they labor, and make them eligible for the position of officers of the Army and the Navy. As they may assist the President in case of war, I have no objection to the Senator's doing so. I am perfectly willing that that bill shall pass and that these men shall be restored to their former rights. This seems to be the Democratic case in brief. The President threw out this message to the country as though it announced something new, as though he was delivering to the people something they never knew before, and he was reenforced by the splendid efforts of my distinguished friend from New York.

Then comes the Republican case, Mr. President. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] introduced a resolution here proposing to take the old Constitution and revive and repair her for service. The other honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] wants an appropriation for the purchase of 1,000,000 stand of small arms and 5,000 cannon for immediate use—or at least to strengthen the military arm of the Government. I will read the bill he introduced:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strengthen the military armament by adding thereto, equipped for use, 1,000,000 infantry rifles, 1,000 guns for field artillery, and not exceeding 5,000 heavy guns for fortifications; to be procured by manufacture in the arsenals, or by contract for manufacture, or by direct purchase in this country or elsewhere, according to the discretion of the President, who shall conform, when practicable without unwise delay, to the methods prescribed for making contracts and purchases by existing laws.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $100,000,000 is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

The honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], no doubt believing that it is good policy to kill two birds with one stone and fight out two controversies in one war, offered a resolution to the effect that we should inquire immediately into the status of the boundary line between the British and the American possessions in Alaska, and especially whether Great Britain is invading our territory in that country by the establishment of post-offices and post-roads. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] on yesterday introduced a bill for the appropriation of a large sum—I do not now recall the amount—for the purpose of increasing our Navy.

So we have the President of the United States and distinguished Democrats in this Chamber urging the Monroe doctrine and urging that the country be put upon a war basis, and we have Republicans upon the other side equally anxious for large appropriations for the purchase of arms and the equipment of the country for any emergency that may arise.

Mr. President, it has become necessary for the Populist party to take a stand here. It will not do to permit the President of the United States and his distinguished associates here to carry off all the glory and honor; it will not do to permit the Democratic party and the Republican party in this Chamber to take away all the glory and honor incident to a discussion of the Monroe doctrine. It is necessary that the Populist party shall have a standing here. Realizing, as we did and do, that the President of the United States and his party, aided by the Republican party, can not wage a war without money; realizing, as we do, that in consequence of a foolish financial policy which has been pursued by both these parties the Government of the United States is to-day practically bankrupt, we have concluded that the first and most essential thing in war is money. Therefore this resolution was introduced expressing it as the sense of the Senate that it was essential for the Finance Committee to inquire into and determine whether it would not be good policy, in view of this great emergency, to open the mints of the United States to the free coinage of silver, and to issue additional Treasury notes.

I think this resolution ought to be adopted by the Senate. I do not want to treat lightly this great doctrine; I do not want to put the Senate in the attitude of trifling with a question of this magnitude; but if it be essential for the Government of the United States to appoint a commission to visit the disputed territory between Venezuela and the British possessions, if it be essential for us to create a navy and to raise and equip an army, then, sir, the first step in that direction is the issuance and the coinage of money and the repletion of our already depleted Treasury.

The financial policy pursued for the last twenty years in this country has brought about the results we witness to-day. The people of this country have appealed from time to time to the President of the United States and to Congress for relief, and they have appealed to the Republican party when it was in power for relief, and their appeals have fallen upon deaf ears. When Mr. Cleveland came into power in 1892, with a splendidly equipped party, the people were told that relief would be brought to them. Mr. President, from that time to this moment prices have fallen, enforced idleness has occurred, until universal distress exists throughout the length and breadth of this country to-day. Instead of taking hold of the financial problem wisely and as a statesman should, with a determination to administer the affairs of this country in the interest of all the people and not a few, the policy of this Administration has been to reduce the money in our Treasury and create a vacancy for the issuance of interest-bearing obligations.

Can it be possible, Mr. President, that this agitation goes deeper than the average mind supposes? Can it be that it is simply laying the foundation for greater expenditures in this country and the issuance of millions, if not billions, of governmental obligations bearing interest, to rest as a great mortgage, a great debt, upon the industries of the people for generations yet to come?

If the President is sincere in his message, if Democrats upon this side who have introduced resolutions and bills are sincere, if the Republicans upon the other side are sincere in the bills and resolutions they have introduced on this subject, then, I say to you, the history of this country proves to us that we must have more money, that we can not erect coast defenses, we can not provide an army and a navy and put ourselves in an attitude of aggressive or defensive warfare without additional money. This resolution, or some action in the line indicated in this resolution, is the first essential in this great undertaking that should receive the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Connecticut please repeat his motion?

Mr. PLATT. That the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on that motion.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KYLE. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw, for the time being, the demand I made for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. HARRIS. This is simply a resolution asking the Committee on Finance to inquire as to certain matters, and report as it may decide. It is perfectly innocent. Ordinarily I should vote to refer such a resolution, but as this simply invokes an inquiry and a report of the Committee on Finance, I see no objection to it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that debate is not in order, the roll call having begun.

Mr. PLATT and Mr. HARRIS. No response has been made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. I think the practice of passing resolutions which make certain assertions is very bad. I think, also, that the practice of directing a committee of this body to inquire and report upon a subject is bad, unless the Senate believe in the doctrine laid down in the resolution. Therefore I move to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. ELKINS]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when Mr. MCBRIDE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MCBRIDE] is detained from the Senate this morning by indisposition. He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. I do not know how he would vote if he were here. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP [when his name was called]. I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I do not see him present, but I will ask his colleague [Mr. PERKINS] if he knows how he would vote on this question?

Mr. PERKINS. I have had no chance to consult with my colleague on this question, and therefore can not answer.

Mr. SHOUP. Then I withhold my vote. If the Senator from California were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am requested to state that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. BRICE. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, inasmuch as he is paired with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], that we transfer our pairs and vote.

Mr. BRICE. That is satisfactory to me. I vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 36; as follows:

So the Senate refused to refer the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BACON and Mr. VEST. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the preamble.

The Secretary read the preamble.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his motion, I will withdraw the preamble and agree to its going out. The preamble may go out.

Mr. PLATT. All right; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now let the resolution be read without the preamble.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let the Secretary read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw the preamble. There is now a call for the reading of the resolution itself without the preamble.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as it has been agreed to.

The resolution was read.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives which has had its first reading.

The bill (H. R. 2173) making an appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana was read the second time by its title.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow me to have a vote on the resolution which has been before the Senate heretofore.

Mr. MORGAN. We will get through with the House bill in a very short time. The Senator's resolution is on the Calendar. I can not consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. This is the House bill which was laid before the Senate yesterday?

Mr. MORGAN. It is.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill unless the Committee on Foreign Relations have some amendments to present.

Mr. MORGAN. I propose to offer some amendments on behalf of the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. All right. Then I will wait.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations have had the measure under consideration, anticipating that it would be acted upon this morning or to-morrow, and have directed me to report certain amendments thereto, which I by their direction have embodied in one proposition, which will constitute an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill.

I wish to state, Mr. President, that there was a difference of opinion in the committee in regard to the propriety or necessity of amending the House bill in any respect, and I, as a member of the committee, do not wish to be committed to the amendments, although if the bill is to be amended I think that the form the committee have adopted for amendment is perhaps as safe and as good as any other that could be selected. I have not given my consent personally, I am allowed to say, I believe, to any amendment to the House bill, thinking that the best and wisest course to pursue and the one that comports most entirely with the present attitude of the question here and abroad would perhaps require of us that we should proceed with the bill as passed by the other House, unless we find some very material objection to it, and pass it.

I will now send to the desk the amendments of the committee as a whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a substitute.

Mr. PLATT. Is it proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the expenses of a commission, to consist of three members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to investigate and report to him the facts in regard to the divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana: Provided, That section 2 of the act approved July 31, 1894, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, and for other purposes, shall not apply to any commissioners appointed under this act.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to explain the proviso. In the event that the House bill should pass the Senate as it came to us the proviso would be unnecessary; at least that is my opinion. The proviso is intended to exempt the three commissioners who are suggested in the substitute from the operation of an act passed in 1894, the general legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of that year, which in section 2 prescribes that any officer receiving $2,500 a year salary shall not be permitted, under that act, to receive any addition to his salary, although he may be appointed to some additional duties or to some other or different office. In the event that we provide for the three commissioners, it is suggested by the Secretary of State, in a note to the committee, that we ought to exempt them from the operation of that statute. That is the object of the committee in putting the proviso in the substitute. If we do not amend the House bill, of course it is irrelevant and unnecessary.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I differ from the conclusions of the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee with great diffidence, and I rise to speak briefly under a good deal of embarrassment, for my opinion is very decided that we had better not amend the House bill—that we had better pass it as it came from the House—and in this I understand the chairman of the committee concurs.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur in that.

Mr. PLATT. Therefore, what I am expressing may be in opposition to the wishes and opinions of some who sit upon this side of the Chamber, although in the consideration of a matter like this there ought to be no aisle of division in the Senate.

It is useless to deny that this is a very great and important subject, and it ought to be treated as such. We ought not to talk about war in the consideration of such a subject. We do not invite it. We deprecate it. There is no reason at present to suppose that war is to be precipitated upon us. The American people will not shun it if it becomes inevitable. I think we all agree in the main with the President in the message which he has sent here. There may be some things in the message which perhaps we would have preferred otherwise, but as to his statement of the position and the determination of the American people upon a great subject there is no difference of opinion. It is no matter whether or not we call it a doctrine or a canon of international law. There is an American policy, and a determination to sustain that policy, which has now been in existence for seventy years at least and upon which there is no division of American sentiment, and that is, if I understand it, that no foreign power is to establish sovereignty and dominion upon the Western Hemisphere or unfairly to extend its sovereignty and dominion upon that hemisphere.

The question arises in the Venezuelan case whether Great Britain is attempting unfairly to extend her sovereignty and authority in Venezuela. The message of the President states the policy of the American people on this subject very clearly and very vigorously. It admits that we are not in full possession of the facts, and the President asks of Congress an appropriation to pay the expenses of a commission to be appointed by him to "make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay." What is the "matter" referred to? The President distinctly states it in his message:

Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana.

Then he suggests that we give him—

An adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay.

I understand, Mr. President, that it is suggested that we amend the bill which comes from the other House in two or three particulars that may seem unimportant, but which in my judgment are exceedingly important. I desire to remark that any amendment made in the Senate will be construed in England as a hesitation on the part of the Senate to sustain the President in the position he has taken. Unless it becomes absolutely necessary, then, to make amendments I should refrain from making them in order that our attitude may not be misunderstood in England.

There seems to be an opinion on the other side of the water that the assertion of American rights and of the American determination to sustain those rights is a campaigning idea, and is put forth at this time for political effect. England must be disabused of any such opinion or belief. The American people were never more in earnest from the breaking out of the Revolution to this day than in their determination to assert and maintain what they believe is essential to the safety of the Republic of the United States, namely, that no foreign power shall establish governmental institutions upon this continent, or unfairly or unrighteously extend such institutions now existing upon this continent. We must be careful, then, to do nothing here which will give plausibility to the already prevalent idea in England that the United States are not united and in earnest upon this matter. If it became essential to change the bill which the House has sent us I should not hesitate to do it, but to my mind it is of no importance. The bill now contains all that the President asks of us, and it is the President of the United States who asks this of Congress. It is not as an individual who occupies the Executive chair that he has addressed us, but he speaks in an official capacity as the President of the country, and in this matter what he says should be treated as the utterance of the President of the United States.

Now, several amendments are proposed. The first one is that the bill shall fix the number of the commission; that it shall consist of three members. Why is it necessary that the Senate should insist on naming the number of which the commission shall consist? Can we not trust the President for that? Is he likely to make the number too large? I think it is entirely unnecessary, and that the matter may well be left to him.

The next proposed amendment is really to strike out the words "to investigate and report upon the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana," and make the commission report to the President "the facts in regard to the divisional line between Venezuela and British Guiana." It seems to me that this amendment is not only not essential, but that there is nothing more in it than a change of language. The bill is in the language which the President suggested—"a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay." The "matter" is "to determine with sufficient certainty for its [the country's] justification what is the true divisional line." So the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives follows the language of the President and provides for arriving at the fact which the President asks to arrive at; that is, the true divisional line.

If anything less than that is intended by the language which is employed in the amendment, then it will be construed as receding from what the President asks us to do. The President asks us to authorize the appointment of a commission which shall determine what is the true divisional line. If the proposed amendment means anything less than that, it will be regarded all over Great Britain as not coming quite up to the request the President made of Congress. If to report "the facts in regard to the divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana" means anything less than the ascertaining of the true divisional line, it will be understood, and rightly understood, that the Senate of the United States is not ready to go to the length which the President asks it to go, namely, to ascertain the true divisional line with reference to the justification of the future action of this Government. Those are two of the amendments proposed.

The third amendment is that the nominations of the commissioners shall be consented to and confirmed by the Senate. I regard it as entirely unimportant and unwise to do that merely because it is supposed that there is some shadowy prerogative which gives us a right to claim that when the President appoints persons charged with a duty such as it is proposed to confer upon them in the pending bill, we shall be consulted and shall confirm them or not, as we choose. I do not think that we ought to embarrass a great question like this with that claim of prerogative. Nor do I understand that there is any claim that persons to be appointed, charged with duties like these, should, under the Constitution, be confirmed by the Senate; that it would be an encroachment by the Executive power to appoint them without sending their names to the Senate. If that be so, the very authority proposed to be given by the bill to the President to appoint these persons to these duties would, by inference at least, certainly answer the claim of prerogative.

But I do not understand that it has ever been seriously claimed upon this side of the Chamber that the Executive is not at liberty to appoint agents to ascertain facts to the end that the Executive may know what action he should take in matters arising between this and foreign countries. What we all complained of in the Blount case was that the President went further than that; that he appointed an officer of the United States Government and commissioned him to a foreign power without confirmation by the Senate. But there is no necessity of raising that controversy again. I do not think we have ever claimed—I have never claimed—that the Executive can not appoint persons, whether he calls them commissioners or agents, or whatever name might be bestowed upon them, who should ascertain facts and report to him for his information as to what he as the Executive ought to do with reference to matters springing up between this and another country. And if we do not insist upon the right to confirm the commissioners, I understand that the further amendment suggested here is unnecessary.

Mr. President, I have very plainly and very frankly, and, as I said, with a good deal of diffidence, expressed my opinion upon this subject. I think the amendments are unnecessary. I think the bill as it came from the other House meets the President's request. I think to amend it at all will be misconstrued in England into the belief and will strengthen the belief already prevalent there that the Senate hesitates to sustain the President of the United States in the ground taken in his message.

Mr. CAFFERY. Before the Senator from Connecticut sits down, I ask him which amendment he has discussed. I have heard of but one, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Louisiana could not have been in.

Mr. CAFFERY. My hearing is not very acute, and I did not hear exactly the extent of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. PLATT. The chairman of the committee, although he said he did not personally agree to the amendment, reported an amendment, as a substitute, which differs from the original bill in the particulars which I have alluded to in the few remarks which I have made, and only in those particulars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the first observation I have to make in regard to this matter is that I can not see for the life of me the necessity of haste in considering the proposition before us. The controversy which is the foundation of these papers is an ancient one; it is one that has existed for many years between Venezuela and Great Britain. The alleged aggressions of Great Britain cover a period of from ten to twenty or thirty years. It is only recently that the subject has been even noted by the people of the United States; but ten or fifteen years ago Great Britain asserted a claim to a line which she now says she will not submit to arbitration.

The message of the President of the United States invites no haste. He simply asks us for certain authority, and that we propose to give him. The terms of that grant of power are contained in the bill sent to us from the House of Representatives. Why should there be any excitement about that? Why should there be any eagerness to seize upon it in order to create a probability of war with Great Britain and to arouse the patriotism of the American people? The American people need no such excitement, if they have to face this matter. Besides, the views of the President of the United States have been sanctioned by both Houses of Congress, and unanimously by both Houses of Congress. He has expressed the opinion of the American people as to the importance of enforcing the Monroe doctrine. He has explained in the clearest possible language the nature and character of that doctrine, the assertion of the people of the United States that they will not allow the various countries of South or North America to be encroached upon by European powers.

This doctrine, though often stated since the time of Mr. Monroe, has never been applied specially in any particular case. We did not regard the doctrine when we invaded Mexico. After Texas had been ceded to us we occupied great portions of Mexican territory, including California. We ought to have thought of it then. But still we have insisted upon our right to protect the American nations from European encroachment, and I believe in it as heartily as any.

But because a bill is sent to us from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the President that we should grant him certain money in order to enable him to prosecute and ascertain as near as possible the real boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, why this hurry and excitement? Why can not we amend the bill like any other? We can not even refer the bill. We must pass it without inquiry or consideration. Why? Is England engaged in a fresh aggression? On the contrary, England is taking very seriously under consideration the situation here. England wants and needs no excitement on this side to compel her to a careful examination of this whole subject-matter. I firmly believe that this matter will be settled by some arrangement between Great Britain and Venezuela, and I have not the slightest idea that a single drop of American blood will be shed in this contest. It will be settled.

Now, this bill comes to us. The Committee on Foreign Relations were called upon to take it up and see whether the particular proposition of the House of Representatives ought to be taken just as it was without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." What occasion is there for that feeling? There is no difference of opinion; the House and Senate agree as to what we ought to do; and now it is proposed by the Senate committee to make some slight modification of the House proposition and then to support it thoroughly.

Let us see what those modifications are. First, we say that when we appoint a commission it ought to be composed of a definite number. What that number is it is for us to say. We are to authorize this commission. The President asks for pay for them, and we are called upon, therefore, to state the number of the commission. Does the Senate know of any case where a commission or a committee has been appointed without fixing the number?

We concluded on the whole that three would be better than five or seven; that a larger number would only make probable a division of opinion, while three able men, confessedly so, from all parts of the United States, could be selected to do what? Not to fix the disputed line, not to say which was the line that ought to be adopted, but to give the President information as to the nature and character and as to the facts and conditions of the gradual aggressions of Great Britain. The question as to what title Venezuela has to that land, as to what title Great Britain has to that land, as to the proper boundary between them, can not be transferred to these three commissioners. The proposition of the House of Representatives required them to point out the true line between these two countries. They are not authorized to do that. The President of the United States must take that responsibility upon himself.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me just to read how the House bill stands? It reads:

> For the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the President, to investigate and report upon the true divisional line.

Not to determine it, but to report upon it; to give the facts in connection with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the House bill confines them to a true divisional line. That is not the point. The President has got to determine that. Therefore this language was simply changed to prescribe the exact purpose and desire of Congress that these persons should inform themselves and should inform the President of the surrounding facts and of all the matters necessary for his determination.

But, sir, the President, as we all know, does not transfer or evade any responsibility put upon him; and the responsibility by the Constitution is upon him and afterwards upon the Senate of the United States, in ratifying any treaty that may grow out of this controversy. Therefore it was thought proper to modify this measure.

So also as to the confirmation of the commissioners by the Senate. This commission, created by law, is something more than a Blount messenger sent to the Hawaiian Islands. This is a commission recognized by law, created by this act, and properly created by it. Under those circumstances these three persons are to be designated by the President of the United States.

There is no question of his power to do it; but according to all the established usages of the Government, according to the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States, their names should be sent to the Senate and confirmed. Why not? There is no controversy between the Senate and the President. It is but right that this body should have a voice in their selection. It passes upon the merits of every postmaster and small officeholder in our broad land, whose names are sent to us because the President alone ought not to control all the vast appointments. We are called upon to confirm or to reject them. Is it not, therefore, proper for the Senate of the United States, possessing under the Constitution this power, to require that its approbation at least shall be given as to these particular persons? I do not suppose there will be any controversy about it, but the right ought always to be reserved.

It can not be said that these are unimportant officers. This act creates them officers. It prescribes their duties. Therefore they are as much officers as any other officers of the Government of the United States. Under these circumstances it does seem to me that it is a small matter to refuse to the Senate of the United States the power to pass upon these officers and their fitness and ability, although I do not believe there will be any controversy, and so I have no doubt the House of Representatives will feel. I have reason to believe that these amendments which have been suggested will be approved by the House of Representatives, although, as a matter of course, no one can speak for that body definitely.

The limitation as to time was a matter discussed. It was proposed in the Committee on Foreign Relations that the time should be limited for these officers to make their report, say to the 1st of April or the 1st of May. On the whole, the committee, after full consideration, thought it was best to leave it open and leave this matter under the control and management of the President of the United States, placing the $100,000 at his command and limiting the number of commissioners. This will no doubt be approved by the President, because more than that number on an inquiry of this kind would be unreasonable.

I say that these amendments would not only improve the language and form of the bill, but I have no doubt they would be promptly agreed to by the House of Representatives and by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not want to be forced to take any measure upon excitement, especially when the excitement is not founded upon real danger or real importance. It seems to me that we should have treated this question as an ordinary matter of legislation. We have postponed until next month and perhaps until next session many important subjects-matter. We have been here three weeks, and have not deemed it necessary to take up any single measure which the people of the United States expect us to pass during this Congress.

Now we are called upon pellmell, as if we were under excitement or on a battlefield, to wave aside all our forms of legislation and refuse to make amendments to a bill sent to us under the present circumstances. It seems to me all this is too hasty; it is too eagerly pressed. There is no occasion for it. The Venezuelan controversy will probably be settled before these gentlemen are appointed or before they progress far in their investigation. We ought not to show a sign of timidity and anxious desire about a fear that does not exist. The Senate of the United States is the last body in the world that ought to be moved by fear or danger. Let us take our time to deliberate. If these amendments are not important vote them down, but certainly we should not base our action on this bill upon any ground that there is a necessity to take precisely what the other House hurriedly sent to us and when the other House would no doubt accept from the Senate these amendments as a proper modification of their bill.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, it occurs to me that one of the most important considerations connected with this whole subject has been utterly overlooked in both Houses. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] well said a few moments ago that money is one of the most essential elements in the prosecution of war. I fail to see, however, how the Government of the United States would be any better off by the proposition submitted by the Senator from Nebraska. It may or it may not be possible that the people of the United States might have more money in their pockets if the mints were thrown open. It may or it may not be possible that it would be better off if the printing presses were to start and print more Treasury notes. But the question for the people and the Government to consider, when about to embark in war with confessedly the first nation of the globe on the ocean, is, where are the revenues to be obtained to come into the pockets of the Government? How are we to get money enough to carry on this war, and carry it on successfully?

It will be no child's play, Mr. President, when we engage in a conflict with Great Britain. Let us not commit the great mistake of underrating our enemy. It may be true, as Senators say, that there will be no war. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. My voice is for peace if peace can be obtained honorably and consistently with the safety and dignity of the people of the United States. But the President of the United States, and the Government of the United States through our Executive, and the Government of Great Britain have arrived at the point, after a long discussion, where both say they will not yield, and the President says that we ought to resist with all the means in our power the establishment as proposed by Great Britain. Surely we are standing face to face on the very edge of battle, and prudence and safety demand that we shall look to our Treasury box and see where we are to obtain the moneys to carry on this great struggle.

Mr. President, during the great civil conflict in the United States the Government was not burdened with vast expenditures as it is to-day. We did not have from $140,000,000 to $150,000,000 of annual pensions to meet. We did not have from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 of annual revenues to be expended in the payment of interest on the public debt. We had an income tax unquestioned. We had a tax on domestic manufactures that brought in one year $127,000,000. The income tax brought to the coffers of the Government one year $72,000,000. All this, sir, is gone. The Constitution declares that you shall not tax real estate except in proportion to population. The Supreme Court has stretched the authority of the Constitution and declared that you shall not tax personal property except in proportion to population. The tax you have got to-day on whisky and on beer and on tobacco is a tax declared unconstitutional by the highest court in the land. It is a tax that exists simply by sufferance.

Then, what are we to depend upon for revenues to carry on this gigantic struggle? Duties on imports? Where are your imports to come from when you are in a death grapple with the greatest naval power in the world? When privateers are swarming out from all the ports of all Christendom on both sides, making the heavens lurid with the flames of burning cargoes in every direction, as they did in 1812, how much imports are going to come into the United States to get you revenues? The amount even to-day is less than $200,000,000 a year. Your annual expenditures require $500,000,000 a year to-day without any war.

Mr. President and Senators, the first duty as we stand on the edge of this conflict is to strike the manacles off this Government and give it power to tax the real and personal estate according to its value all over the Union. We are rich in men, rich in courage, rich in all the elements necessary to carry on a great war; but it is a giant manacled by the Constitution and by the decrees of the Supreme Court. I, as an American citizen, animated by the same fire and devotion to the flag that represents the sovereignty of this nation as the proudest of you, demand that before we are plunged into this conflict the hands of the nation shall be untied, and that we shall not be compelled after a conflict to make a dishonorable peace, disgraceful to the nation, because it had not the means to prosecute a successful war.

Before we adjourn for the holidays we ought to submit an amendment to the Constitution giving Congress the power to levy and collect taxes on both real and personal estate all over the country in accordance with its value and not in proportion to population. The American people will never submit to a tax of that kind, unjust, wicked, nefarious, as it is, if a large amount is drawn from their pockets in such an unequal proportion, but the American people will submit to any taxation that is just and fair when it is levied for the purpose of vindicating the honor, the safety, and the good name of the Republic. They will be lavish in both money and blood.

The legislatures of a number of States will be in session in a few days. We, without distinction of party, in both branches of Congress, ought by a unanimous vote to submit to the legislatures an amendment to the Constitution giving to the National Government the power to reach the pockets of all the $70,000,000,000 of wealth in this country, so as to enable the Government to carry on the war which it may wage, and to carry it on in accordance with the interests and the honor of the American people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over temporarily, not losing its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the House bill is still before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yesterday gave notice of an amendment to the House bill appointing this commission. I desire now to withdraw the amendment, or, rather, to state that I shall not press it.

My first reason for doing so is that I think it is of the utmost importance that there should be absolutely no division whatever in the Senate on any question involving the support of the President in the position he has taken, and there might be a division on this amendment if pressed to a vote.

My second reason is that on reflection it seems to me that placing a limit upon the time within which the commission shall report is needless, because the President has stated in his message that they are to report with the least possible delay. The date I fixed is unnecessarily distant, and it is better that no date should be fixed. I desire to give the President all that he asks and the utmost latitude. Where the fullest discretion is given there the responsibility will lie, and there it ought to lie—the responsibility both to the American people and to the vast interests which are involved.

But, Mr. President, I desire to say that for the same reason I should hope that on this bill would be placed the amendment allowing the Senate to advise and consent to the appointment of the commission, not for the purpose of asserting the prerogative of the Senate, but because I think it would strengthen that commission and strengthen the hands of the President to have it understood that those commissioners enter on their work not only as his appointees, but with the unanimous approbation of the Senate.

The one object, it seems to me, that we should aim at in all this grave business is not haste or excitement, but entire firmness, and that we should show to the world that we are absolutely united in the position that has been taken. It is freely charged that this is mere electioneering business. I want to see that idea done away with. I want to make it understood by every means in our power that there is no division of sentiment among the American people, and I want the action of the Senate to say plainly to those people in London who are undertaking to make a scare in this country by selling stocks and calling loans in the American market, that the American people are united on this question, that they propose to stand by the Monroe doctrine, and that the attempt to create a panic in Wall street, to call loans and drain our gold, is not the road to an honorable and a peaceful settlement.

For this reason, Mr. President, I desire, for my own part, to put no obstacle in the way of the unanimous adoption of the amendments proposed by the committee or of the bill itself. I desire that we shall proceed with deliberation and dignity, but with the most entire firmness, and that we shall settle with this question and pass this bill before we adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there is no doubt that the sentiment in this country in favor of what is popularly known as the Monroe doctrine is practically unanimous. Within a few years past many things have happened which have excited the indignation of the American people. They have felt, and had reason to feel, that Great Britain assumed a domineering attitude toward the United States—that she was unwilling to recognize the rights of our people or our country.

Among the irritating causes we might mention the destruction of the seals in Alaska. Undoubtedly Great Britain is to blame for it, and that is the opinion of the American people. We can also mention the fact that she is setting up a claim to a portion of the Territory of Alaska which has been recognized by all as ours, and which has been in the peaceable possession of our grantors and of ourselves for three-quarters of a century. It is asserted by the agents of Great Britain or Canada that instead of the shore line being the shore line that has been recognized for three-quarters of a century, the shore line from which the measurement must be taken is in the ocean beyond the islands. The mere statement of such a claim outrages our sense of justice and has created much feeling.

Again, in Nicaragua last spring, we find Great Britain proceeding to take military possession of a portion of Nicaragua on a claim so flimsy as not to bear examination for one hour among honest men. Her proceedings in that direction were manifestly for the purpose of thwarting the scheme of the United States to build an interoceanic canal. We find Great Britain the lion in the path.

Then, again, we find her changing her boundary from time to time in Venezuela because Venezuela is a weak power. It is not because of Venezuela alone, but if there is a feeling of indignation in the United States against Great Britain it is her fault. It is her aggression, her arrogance, and her disposition to trample upon the rights of the American people which has aroused this feeling.

It is said on the other side of the Atlantic by, I think, a majority of the people in England, France, and Germany that this is a mere electioneering dodge. They assume that the President is actuated by the ordinary motives which have actuated monarchs and despots and presidents from the beginning of governments to get up a controversy with a foreign power whenever politics were desperate at home. That is the old thing to do, and they assume that it is what the President is doing. It is said he is doing it for political purposes. We can see very well how he might gain by it politically. We can see very well how this thing might be dragged along and that Great Britain might settle with Venezuela, and then our task would be done. If Great Britain should disclaim what she has done the President's friends would say that he brought it about by his firmness. I can see how there might be political gain in it; but gain or no gain, it is a declaration in favor of the Monroe doctrine; it is a declaration opposed to the usurpation of Great Britain; it is an American declaration, and I am in favor of sustaining it.

The President having inaugurated this, he having the responsibility, I am in favor of giving him the entire responsibility of ascertaining the facts, and I am in favor of the House bill as it came to us. That bill provides just exactly what he asks for, and if he is not in good faith, if he does not execute this supreme duty according to the spirit and the demand of the American people, the American people will know the reason why. He has put himself in the breach, and declared for the American doctrine of self-defense and noninterference of any European power with the Governments or territories of any country in all the Americas—he has put himself squarely there. Give him the money and let him make the investigation.

I do not believe there is danger of war. I do not believe Great Britain will insist upon an unjust demand against Venezuela when she knows that it involves war with the United States. Great Britain can put an end to this thing in a day by being honest and reasonable. There would be no trouble about that. She is the aggressor, but if she is going to pursue a policy of aggression upon this continent, as she does in every other part of the globe, the sooner we know it the better.

As to raising the necessary revenue and amending the Constitution so that revenue can be raised, that is too unimportant to discuss. We have been through wars before this time, and ample power was found in this Government to raise revenue. When the people of the United States are called upon to defend the principles which they cherish as most sacred and to defend their rights against any country, and particularly against Great Britain, there will be no lack of money. Seventy million people can furnish all the money necessary to vindicate their honor. There can be nothing more injurious to the American people than to submit to the arrogance of Great Britain. It breeds toadyism; it breeds dependence; it destroys American manhood; it destroys the pride of being an American citizen.

War under any circumstances is to be avoided if possible. War is a great calamity; but it is nothing to the sacrifice of honor. There are other things worse than war. We have had twenty-five years of abundant harvests and profound peace, and there is more suffering to-day in the country than ever before in its history. I am not sure but the people of this country would welcome the change, if it was from peace to war, in view of the general distress which prevails.

I want American manhood asserted, and inasmuch as the President has announced a doctrine in which we all concur, let us give him the power to vindicate it, and the country will hold him responsible. He is willing to take the responsibility. Let the House bill as it came to us be passed; let it proceed in order; let it proceed now, so that it will be known on both sides of the Atlantic what the American people mean and what they will do in defense of what they know to be their rights. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the galleries that it is in violation of the rules of the Senate to show approbation of or dissent from what is said on the floor of this body. A repetition of the offense will call for an enforcement of the rule of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I can not bring myself to believe that there is in the present situation such serious menace to the peace of the world as may be implied from remarks made here and from utterances elsewhere. I concur in everything that has been said with reference to the necessity of firmly, rigidly, and at all times enforcing the Monroe doctrine. I indorse the views of the President of the United States in affirmation of the principles upon which we understand that doctrine is grounded; but I do not think that any occasion will arise as the result of the Venezuelan dispute to require the assertion of the full powers of this Government in maintenance of that doctrine. I am persuaded that if upon that careful, that judicial investigation which the President suggests, facts at present but little known and imperfectly appreciated are made patent, there will be no grave obstacle to an honorable solution. I can not understand that there is any immediate reason to apprehend momentous difficulty or cause for intense excitement. The war cloud does not seem to me to be so large. I am unwilling to entertain the thought that as to such a question, important though it may be, any conclusion will be reached which does not comport with the universal desire of all Christian people for peace.

Mr. President, what is the condition of this controversy? What is it concerning which we are now in contention as far as Great Britain is concerned? We lay no claim to one foot of the territory of Venezuela. We merely assert that Great Britain must not take from Venezuela territory which is palpably hers. We do not propose, I imagine, to solve a bona fide boundary dispute upon any narrow or technical ground, nor to engage in conflict without the establishment of a clear case justifying such action; but we are assuming, if we talk in a belligerent manner, that England is about to absorb territory which of right plainly pertains to Venezuela. Is England attempting so to do? This is the vital question upon which our right to act depends. The President of the United States informs us that it is not clearly known to him; that he has not the information to give us upon which he or we can base a final judgment to the effect that England is about to perpetrate this usurpation, this violation of the Monroe doctrine. In order to ascertain whether there is really a just cause for complaint, whether the generally existing sentiment here against English conduct in this case is or is not well founded, he proposes to appoint a commission, and upon the report of that commission to fully and fairly consider the case, and if there is proof that European territorial acquisition is contemplated, then the whole matter will be submitted to Congress with a recommendation for affirmative action.

It may be, and from the statements made by those who ought to know much more about it than I do it is probable, that there has been aggression, but we are not in a condition to announce this as a fact. We have not the evidence upon which we can so find. We must know that we are right before we act. The only question, as I understand it, before the Senate is whether we will concur in enacting a statute giving to the President the means to enable him to carry out the laudable desire which he expresses, and which we all wish may eventuate in a final clear and convincing report and recommendation. So far as the means of accomplishing this end are concerned, if I had my way about it I would rather appropriate $100,000 for the purpose of enabling the President to take such action in this matter as may comport with his views of his executive duty. I would rather omit the word "commission" from the bill, and merely give the President the money to enable him to obtain the essential facts, by commission or otherwise, and report the same to Congress, and, failing in this, I prefer the House bill, without amendment. When the President does act, it will be for Congress to determine what to do.

There can be no declaration of war save through Congress. Anything the commission may do, any suggestion it may offer will be advisory; it will not be conclusive upon us or upon the Executive. The recommendation made by the President will not bind Congress. Such expression will be valuable and presumably correct, but, after all, we must act under our constitutional prerogative; upon our own responsibility and judgment in the final determination as to whether there is or is not a cause for hostilities. I do not agree that we should insist upon any power, actual or assumed, to confirm the commission.

I prefer that the President be allowed to select his own commission absolutely unfettered by the wishes of the Senate. Then when the report reaches us it will be the report of the President of the United States announcing his opinion as to the duty of Congress upon the submission made by the commission. Congress then will take such action with relation thereto as it may deem best.

I consider it proper, before concluding, to call attention to the fact that at the last session of the late Congress the Senate adopted a resolution reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with regard to Hawaii, which clearly and tersely announced our rule in these words:

Resolved, That of right it belongs wholly to the people of the Hawaiian Islands to establish and maintain their own form of government and domestic policy; that the United States ought in no wise to interfere therewith; and that any intervention in the political affairs of these islands by any other Government will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States.

Here we extended our jurisdiction beyond the American Continent; we disregarded 2,000 miles of intervening ocean, and we there said with reference to those islands that we should regard any intervention there as an act unfriendly to the United States, and this declaration has been and will be respected. There is, therefore, manifestly no impropriety in the insistence upon the same time-honored principle with reference to the continent upon which we sustain our nationality.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the honorable Senator from California a question?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The question I propose to ask is for the purpose of testing the construction which the Senator from California places upon the Monroe doctrine. Suppose we give the President this commission, that they meet and attend to the duties imposed upon them, that they report back their sentiments, and the President and the Congress of the United States decide upon the facts reported as to the precise location of the line between British Guiana and Venezuela; then suppose after that the Government of Venezuela, either through fear of becoming involved in war with Great Britain, or for any other cause, should consent by treaty stipulation to transfer a portion of the territory which we have decided belongs to Venezuela. What I wish to know is, would that be such a settlement as the United States could agree to and still be held to be a vindication of the Monroe doctrine on our part?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the interrogatory submitted by the Senator from Oregon is broad. It involves the consideration of an extended subject. I do not think that the topic to which he refers is embraced in this controversy. I am firm in the conviction that there might be attempted cessions of territory by some of the States of this continent, to which cessions it would be the duty of the United States to object. Intimations of that character have already been officially given with reference to Cuba. But I am unwilling to lay down a rule in the absence of a subject for its application, or to define the Monroe doctrine in complete and entirely comprehensive terms, or to apply it or attempt to apply it to a contingency which has not yet arisen. I do not pretend to be able upon the spur of the moment, or perhaps at any time, to state our national duty in every case where an American nation may desire to cede land to a European Government. Such an effort upon my part might result in a statement upon which I would be unwilling to rest in every possible controversy. There is a case before us. I am addressing myself to that case, and I am not seeking to enlighten upon a condition which may or may not hereafter transpire. Actual issues I am prepared to decide. The message of the President contemplates the possibility of the taking of territory by force. It treats of the occupancy of Venezuelan soil by the British Government against the will of Venezuela. It is with that hypothesis, and that alone, that I am dealing.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me on that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I simply desire to say, in order to place myself right, that I shall answer my own question by saying that that would be a settlement the Government of the United States could not consent to and at the same time vindicate the integrity of the Monroe doctrine, because I believe the true construction of the Monroe doctrine to be that no European power shall, without our consent, be permitted, either by force or by treaty stipulation, to acquire one foot of soil they do not now own or control on this hemisphere.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to add, with reference to the remark of the Senator from Oregon, that while I am glad to have his views upon the subject—for I have a great respect for him and for his views—nevertheless, I do not care to adopt his conclusions at present. We will confer about that later when an issue in which the matter is material is pending.

But, concluding, I will say that I do not propose to offer any amendment whatever to the bill. I have simply expressed my judgment, to the effect that it would be preferable, after making ample appropriation, to leave this feature of the Venezuelan question wholly with the Executive, and I once more indorse the Presidential definition of duty, and while entertaining the opinions already given relating to the formal part of our proceedings, I am ready to support the bill in such form as the Senate may deem desirable.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I think the relations between the United States and Great Britain at this moment are of a very critical character, and it is because I think war is imminent between these two great powers should the pretensions of either or both sides be stubbornly maintained that I heartily concur in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in favor of a conservative and temperate course of action.

Should war ensue between the United States and Great Britain out of this Venezuelan controversy, upon the Senate of the United States and the coordinate branch of Congress will rest the responsibility. We are the war-making power. The President of the United States may precipitate war, but these two bodies have the exclusive power for the authoritative declaration of war. It is precisely for this reason that I contend that the Senate of the United States have the undoubted privilege, and it is their duty in this instance to exercise it, to supervise the appointment of the commissioners provided for in the bill that passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, in the interrogatory of the Senator from Ohio, what need is there of haste? Is our honor suffering? Is our frontier invaded? Are not our ships permitted to plow the ocean unmolested? In what particular are we assailed so that we can not wait for a dispassionate investigation into the merits of this controversy between Venezuela and Great Britain? It occurs to me that the very appointment of the commission is a warlike step. It occurs to me that it is a very extreme application of the Monroe doctrine to undertake to settle a boundary question in dispute between European powers and Governments in South America. But, sir, even that step, which in my opinion is a forecast of war, may not lead to the dire conclusion of war if temperate and wise counsels are followed as to it.

I can not contemplate war with the tranquillity that some seem to do; I know something of its horrors; I know something of its devastation. But if the occasion demanded war, if the honor or the interests of the United States were so insulted or infringed upon as to make a call to arms necessary, I should not hesitate on account of the financial condition of the United States to enter into war. I believe our people would respond to the call of patriotism; I believe they have the resources in their own midst; I believe that bonds of the United States would be taken by our own population, and afford all the resources necessary to carry on war with the greatest power upon earth.

But, sir, it occurs to me, knowing the terror, knowing the sufferings, knowing the upheaval itself that will follow from the contention between these two vast powers, we ought not to be precipitate or hasty. Let us give a breathing time. The people of the United States are excited. I do not feel that I am saying too much in saying that the members of Congress are excited on this question. All the facts surrounding it, every circumstance connected with it, ought to be diligently inquired into and temperately considered before we launch upon this tremendous scheme of battle.

Senators say that there is no danger of war. I do not share with them in that opinion. I hope they are correct; I pray that they are correct. Feeling the deep responsibility entailed upon me as a member of this Senate and a part of the war-making power of this Government, while I do not take counsel of any fear in my breast, it behooves me to take counsel of my prudence; and in taking counsel of that prudence I consider it wise, and proper, and just that the bill which has passed the House of Representatives be amended as suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, yesterday I thought that perhaps it would be wise to amend this bill as other bills from the House of Representatives are amended. To-day I do not think so. I believe that it is of the highest national importance that this bill should to-day pass the Senate exactly as it came from the House of Representatives.

The amendment proposed is not material. We should, of course, consent to the appointment by the President of any commissioners whose names he might send to the Senate for confirmation, and I am in favor of leaving, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has well said, the whole responsibility of present action upon the President. He has all the power in the world necessary for the present crisis except money. He can not touch a dollar of money in the Treasury except with the consent of Congress, and we should freely and ungrudgingly give him that money to use as he pleases.

The President of the United States in this emergency has risen above party. He has shown himself to be patriotic and wholly American. Inspired by the spirit of Massachusetts, which now pervades and prevails in the State Department, he has taken American ground, from which the United States will never recede. I am in favor of meeting the President upon that ground. Is there a Democrat here who is in favor of doing any more than ought to be done, hoping thereby to promote the interests of his party? I do not believe there is. Is there a Republican here in favor of doing less than ought to be done, thinking thereby to promote the interests of his party? I do not believe there is; and if the President, whether he be himself a candidate for reelection next year or whether some other distinguished member of his party shall be a candidate for election as President next year, has done his utmost in the sight of the whole world to remove this question of foreign affairs from the disputes of American politics, shall not the people all over the country, without distinction of party, respond to his efforts and sustain his hands in every direction and in every particular?

If when we enter the Presidential canvass of next year there shall be no question of foreign policies involved, and our politics stop at the water's edge, as Senator LODGE has reminded us Mr. Webster said they ought to stop, and we decide the question who shall be President solely upon the consideration of American interests and domestic policies, we ought to thank God that President Cleveland at this time and in this emergency led the way to that separation from politics which always should prevail among political parties on questions of foreign policy.

Mr. President, I am told that stocks have gone down—that Wall street is agitated and State street is agitated—because a Democratic President, sustained by a Republican Congress, proposes to defend the national honor. If stocks have gone down materially, I undertake to say that they are stocks which ought to go down, irrespective of national complications. No stock of any real value in the American or English markets will be seriously affected because the American honor is to be preserved in this crisis of our fortunes. For one I do not propose, and I do not believe any member of the Senate or of the House or any American citizen proposes, to be intimidated in this emergency by the declarations of foreign capitalists, by any conspiracy of foreign bankers, to destroy the credit of this country or the value of American stocks in the markets of the world in order to prevent the Congress of the United States from appropriating money to enable President Cleveland to do exactly what he thinks he ought to do in this decisive hour in our affairs.

I read a cable dispatch to the New York Sun of to-day:

LONDON, December 19.

A grave but inevitable consequence of President Cleveland's message upon the British-Venezuelan dispute has arisen perhaps sooner than might have been expected. A meeting of prominent financial leaders who have important interests in the United States was held in a London banking office to-day——

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish the Senator would read that again.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

A meeting of prominent financial leaders who have important interests in the United States was held in a London banking office to-day for the purpose of considering the advisability of united action—in calling in their American credits. It is undoubtedly within the power of English capitalists by such a combined movement to deal America a blow which would, temporarily, be terribly embarrassing and disastrous. It would, however, prove, to a certain extent, a boomerang, and this view had its influence upon the majority of those who attended to-day's meeting. The conference was private, and it was not intended even that the fact that it took place should be allowed to be made public. I am permitted to cable only the general trend of the discussion and the result.

United action—

The article proceeds:

A strong sentiment of resentment against President Cleveland, and a spirit of retaliation were expressed at the outset of the consultation by several gentlemen. In fact, personal feeling, instead of financial astuteness, seemed to control two or three of those present until cooler counsels prevailed. The point chiefly debated was the question how far the exigencies of domestic politics influenced the President's action, and to what extent his position was supported by the real public sentiment of the country.

Mr. President, I hope a voice may go out from the Senate to-day which will pronounce the opinion of the American Senate that the exigencies of domestic politics did not influence the President or the Secretary of State in the action which they have taken, but that they were guided in this instance, at least, solely by a regard for the public interest and the public welfare.

There were no defenders of the President among those present.

Alas, Mr. President, has it come to this! [Laughter.] I ask the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber to contemplate the fact that their President, who has done more for England than any President that ever sat in the White House, has now fallen so low that there are none to do him reverence, and that when the great financiers of Great Britain assembled and made a determination and quietly allowed what they had done to leak out so that it might go to Wall street and to State street, "there were no defenders of the President among those present." [Laughter.]

On the contrary, he was denounced unsparingly, and his conduct was described by several as insane.

Mr. President, what is to be your answer to that assault upon your President? What is to be the answer of Senators upon the other side to that attack upon their Chief Magistrate? What is to be the answer of Republicans upon this side of the Chamber? Do we propose to sit here when the President has adopted a course and announced a policy that is approved by everyone of us and hear him called insane upon the other side of the ocean—while we debate the petty question whether we should or not insist upon our right to confirm or reject the commissioners whom he may appoint?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CHANDLER. When I finish this sentence. Are we to hesitate whether we had not better insist upon acting upon his nominees, and whether we had not better insist—I do not even remember what the other amendments are——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. I will yield in a moment, as I always do, to the Senator from Nebraska. Are we to hesitate about such matters when what is needed is a unanimous expression by the Senate sustaining the action of the President? What does the Senator from Nebraska desire to say?

Mr. ALLEN. I did not notice in the account which the Senator read of the meeting in London whether Rothschild was present or not. I should like to ask the Senator whether Rothschild was there.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator's inquiry is appropriate. It is the old game that is being practiced upon us. There are no names mentioned. It was a conference purely for effect on this side of the water. They pretended that it was a private affair, but they intended that it should be public, and it has had its influence to-day in Wall street and State street, and telegrams are being sent in here now by the score, warning the Senate not to protect the honor of the United States for fear stocks may go down a little.

Mr. ALLEN. With respect to applying the Monroe doctrine so as to keep the British out of possession of territory that may menace our mainland, does not the Senator believe that more danger comes to the United States and to the Government of the United States through British capital invested in this country in stocks, mortgages, and bonds?

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the question?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not think there is more danger from that source than from any other source, and whether it would not be wise to pursue such a policy as would cause the withdrawal of English capital from this country and the transaction of business upon our own money. Then there would never be occasion for any Englishman or any congregation of Englishmen to say that they believe the President of the United States is insane.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am willing, with the Senator from Nebraska, to try to accomplish American financial independence of England and our industrial and commercial independence of England. But let us take one thing at a time. I dislike very much the disposition of the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], if he will allow me to refer to him, to mix together different questions.

Now, we are dealing with only one thing, the question of national honor in reference to the Venezuelan controversy. I say this is a deliberately concocted scheme of English financiers to frighten the United States. They believe the pocket nerve is sensitive; that the conservative property-holding and bond-holding people of the United States will check those insane persons who are trying to precipitate war between the two countries, one of whom—our own country—ought to remain perpetually in commercial and financial dependence upon the other.

So, Mr. President, not only was I called insane when a few weeks ago I calmly announced that I thought the grave questions between us and England would have to be settled by war some time within twenty years, but now behold President Cleveland, but lately the great apostle of English principles of American tariff reform and the idol of the British aristocracy, the British manufacturers, and British financiers, is to-day, in a conference of British bankers in London, pronounced insane. If no one will further interrupt me I will finish this article:

Most of those present refused to believe that the American people seriously indorse his action.

Mr. President, I propose that the Senate of the United States to-day give an emphatic utterance of indorsement of his action. I say that any hesitation whatever, any failure to pass the bill now, will be an indorsement of the insult to the President and the attack upon the national credit which the money lenders and the bankers of Great Britain have made, feeling themselves able, by threats and bullying, to frighten the people of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield the floor to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield the floor to the Senator from South Carolina, who I hope will speak fully on this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; I merely wish to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina wishes to interrogate the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am very happy to be interrogated by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he would vote for the bill if he knew the result would be that the gold reserve would disappear and we should get to a silver basis, as is threatened?

Mr. CHANDLER. There is the same tendency of our Populist friends to mix up questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought the Senator understood that I am not a Populist. If I am not a Democrat there are no Democrats here.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not hear the Senator. What are the Senator's politics, may I ask?

Mr. TILLMAN. They are those which I learned from Jefferson and Calhoun and Lincoln. My politics are American. The Senator from New Hampshire does not answer the question, however.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina first that we are all of that politics now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Senator from New Hampshire still vote for the bill if he knew that the gold reserve would disappear; that Wall street would swallow it up?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will answer the Senator from South Carolina by saying that I will vote for any sacrifice, even for the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], which is the concrete absurdity of all his schemes for financial blundering. [Laughter.] I will vote for that if it is necessary to defend the national honor.

Mr. TILLMAN. We join hands. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I hope I may say in behalf of the committee that none of the proposed amendments have been offered merely for the sake of amending the bill of the House of Representatives. We think they have substantial merits, which present themselves as a modification of the original proposition.

In the first place, there is an overture here to create a commission without numbering the persons who shall compose it. That, we think, is a precedent with a good deal of mischief in it; more than may now be seen. We think it is much safer to name the number, as we have, by inserting the word "three."

Again, as these commissioners are agents of the President and the Government and the people of the United States, in the discharge of a very important trust and investigation, it would add something to the dignity of their official station as well as somewhat of importance to the examination which they are to undertake, to make them subject to the confirmation of the Senate, without any reference to Senatorial prerogatives. We did it purely for the purpose of making the protest against foreign aggression in one of the South American Republics more effective and more forcible.

In the next place, what I regard as the most material amendment is the insertion of the word "facts" and striking out the word "true." In the bill of the House of Representatives it was said that the commission should report upon the true divisional line, evidently granting to the commission judicial powers, giving them the authority to decide, giving them the authority to determine a mixed question of law and fact—a true divisional line. All that the President alludes to in his message, and all that we think ought to be comprised in the act of Congress passed in answer to it, is an investigation of the documents, evidence, and facts relating to the disputed divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and the colony of British Guiana. We do not want the opinion of the commission as to the law. I think it would be a derogation of both Houses of Congress and a derogation of the executive department of the Government to ask a commission to be created charged with the duty of determining the international law of this case or of any other. The bill with the amendments proposed by the committee clearly confines the commission to a finding and report of facts. It clearly carries out the request of the President, the inquiry of the President for the best and latest and most authentic information with respect to the boundary line between those two countries.

I am at a loss to understand, sir, some expressions I have heard even here and elsewhere to the effect that the commission is to make the discovery whether the Monroe doctrine is applicable to the Venezuelan boundary-line case. I do not think that that is the duty of the commission. When we pass the bill we decide that question. When we pass the bill the Congress of the United States says, the President in his approval of it says, "The boundary line between those two countries is our affair. This is not an unlawful interference. This is not an unlawful intervention either under the law of nations or any American policy." But we say, "What shall be the line between these two countries is our concern; it is an affair of the United States." When we decide that the Monroe doctrine is applicable, the only office of the commission is to gather facts which shall enable us to determine whether there may be necessity for its enforcement in this case—whether there has been any or is likely to be any violation of it.

There are some streams which constitute, or may constitute, a part of the divisional line. There is the Essequibo, and there are other rivers. Whatever other rivers there may be within the disputed territory, we cross one when we pass the bill. We cross the Rubicon, and we can never recede with honor until these differences be settled upon a fair and just basis. For example, if the British Government should accede to our views with respect to the true line—that is, the views of the President after information of the facts, and the views of Congress after the same information—then there is no occasion for the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

And there are other contingencies which might do away with the necessity of enforcing it, but in passing the bill we do apply it. Whether we shall enforce it or not depends upon subsequent contingencies. I believe that it will be enforced, fully enforced with plenary power, with all the military and naval resources of the United States should Great Britain not accede to what we think, after full information, is the just and true line of demarcation between the territory of the two Governments.

I was very glad to hear the learned and honorable Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] decline to make any definition of the Monroe doctrine. I think we ought very seriously to meditate upon this matter. The Monroe doctrine has been enforced over seventy years. No legislative definition of it has ever been made. There is no reason why it should be. All Americans understand what it is. What is meant by it? Like many cases in the courts that concern specific performance, those concerning the quieting of titles, the courts refuse to define, to make any definition, but at the same time they do not hesitate to apply the doctrine whenever a proper case is presented. We have had various applications of the Monroe doctrine. The last, I think, one of the simplest and clearest applications of the Monroe doctrine, was made by this body in its resolution upon the subject of Hawaii, already referred to by the Senator from California, who preceded me.

Sir, there is an exact place and room for the exercise of the doctrine as the President has requested. We are not bound to wait for an actual aggression. We are not bound to wait an attack. So say all the writers upon international law, and especially Mr. Vattel, the Blackstone of that branch of jurisprudence, who has a chapter upon this subject.

How appearances of danger give the right to make war.
A nation that has a neighbor at once powerful and ambitious has her all at stake.

We have such a neighbor. I know it is a very common thing to refer to the 3,000 miles of ocean waste between us; but recollect that our neighborhood with Great Britain is not bounded by that, but by a mere imaginary line on terra firma, the southern line of the Dominion of Canada.

As men are under a necessity of regulating their conduct in most cases by probabilities, those probabilities claim their attention in proportion to the importance of the subject, and their first right to obviate a danger is in a compound ratio of the degree of probability and the danger threatened. * * * If appearances are so easily credited, it is the fault of that neighbor who has betrayed his ambition by several indications.

That is a quotation from one of the oldest authorities, that a threatened danger constitutes a just casus belli. It seems to me as if the institutions of government have a sort of geographical distribution. There is the oldest grand division of the globe, Asia, and the largest, which never had a republic within its limits. To-day it is governed by imperialism, by despotism, and by a modification, in British India, of the same character of government, for where a small minority rules a very large majority by virtue of the sword, though tempered by law, by justice, by Christianity, the republic is yet barred. None has yet appeared in Asia. There is no prospect of any. Europe has had a divided history. A great many republics have appeared there, but, looking to the present status of governments to-day, it would seem there are only two republics in that quarter of the globe. Therefore the great weight and force of public tradition and, as far as it goes, of public opinion seem to be against the republican system in that part of the world. At least this is the present apparent condition.

Our hemisphere has happily had a different history. Very early the United States vindicated the doctrine of self-government. That sublime example has been followed until every nationality from the southern line of the Dominion to Cape Horn has now a government republican in form. The British colony of Guiana is not a nationality, and there are one or two little other specks of colonial possessions, but with that exception the whole of this hemisphere south of the Canadian line is dedicated to the cause and policy of the government of the people, for and by the people. It is consecrated to that cause and policy, and that principle is as dear to every American as his own State and his own country. The cause is dear; the cause is precious; the cause is well worth maintaining that here on this hemisphere men shall govern themselves, and no armed strangers, with whatever force, with whatever violence, shall prevent the feeblest people upon the Western Hemisphere from regulating their own institutions to suit themselves.

Now, Mr. President, it may be asked and has often been asked, will the Government of the United States then assume the guardianship over all the republics of the American Continent? No, Mr. President, we do not assume any such guardianship. The guardianship has been cast upon us. It has come to us by the force of political gravitation, and by reason of our primacy among the republics of the American hemisphere and among the governments of the world. Our primacy is determined first by the great victory of the American Revolution, the seniority of this Government to all other existing republics except one; next, by the wealth, the resources, and the territorial extent of the United States; third, by her accredited and proven naval and military strength. It is this which has drawn to us the guardianship of the other republics upon this hemisphere. We can not avoid it. We can not evade it. It belongs to that class of duties indicated in private life by the maxim "Noblesse oblige." We are bound by this condition to maintain that supremacy, and, as master of the situation, as leader in the line of liberty, to repel every assault, from whatever quarter, which shall interfere with governments by the people established on this continent.

It is a guardianship, sir, that must continue as long as the present condition of those republics obtains. I do not think it will last very long. Before the middle of the next century Mexico, with the lesser republics between her southern line and the Isthmus, will constitute a confederacy, a union; delegates from these republics will meet in full accord, and will at a certain predestined time and place, in imitation of our glorious ancestors, form a more perfect union and establish a firmer form of government than that which now prevails among them. We shall have the United States of Central America.

I think further, sir, that south of the Isthmus those smaller republics—I speak not in disparagement—in wealth and population will find a similar path to unity, to power, to increased prestige, and that there are some even in this audience who may live to witness the United States of South America. Then, when we have three confederacies of free, independent States in the North, in Central America, and in the South, each will have those larger means and resources of defense which will enable it to repel the attacks of Great Britain or any other European power, and will prevent even the menace of injury by any such power. I believe also this example of free government will be still further glorified and some of those older countries will follow the example, the very recent example, of France, that toward the close of the next century mankind may welcome the United States of Europe to complete the constellation of free republics within the civilized regions of the globe.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this question appears to me to present itself to every Senator in this light: The President of the United States has informed Congress that the Government of Great Britain claims a large portion of the territory of the Republic of Venezuela without foundation of right, and appeals to the Government of the United States to enforce in aid of Venezuela what is known as the Monroe doctrine, with the declaration that the territory of the American Republics shall not by force be taken from them by any European Government and its policy and form of government established over it. The President has informed Great Britain that this country desires an arbitration between the Venezuelan Government and the Government of Great Britain. Great Britain has declined that arbitration, and proposes to insist upon her claim of right as determined by herself in opposition to the action of the Government of Venezuela. The President has declared that the policy of this Government, proclaimed in the Monroe doctrine, will forbid us from assenting to that action on the part of England and will demand of us that we shall use all the resources of this country to prevent it.

Now, we are all in accord to sustain the President of the United States upon this proposition. The question is, how shall we do it? A bill is brought here from the House of Representatives to appoint commissioners who shall have the authority to do what? What are they to do, Mr. President? They can not decide this question of the boundary. If they do decide it, will the Congress of the United States respect that opinion? And, should they respect it, is it not an abrogation of the functions of this body? Are they merely to collect information? Is there, then, no established method by which that can be done? Why shall we appoint commissioners to get documents from abroad, to examine witnesses? Is it not within the competency of this body and the other House to obtain any documents that may be required, and will not the action of Congress be embarrassed if these gentlemen, either three or more, shall declare that Great Britain is right and that the boundary line named by her is the proper boundary line?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] says that it is not desired to have the opinion of these commissioners upon the law, but simply as to the facts. Suppose they say that the facts of the case are that the boundary line is as claimed by Great Britain, what is to be the action of Congress? Are we to adopt that report or not; and if we are not to adopt it, will it not be an embarrassment to the Congress of the United States in ascertaining the proposition laid down by the Senator from Indiana that we declare that it is our concern what is the boundary line and what is not when we appoint a commission to report facts here, and that report is not to be binding upon the Congress of the United States?

I am desirous and willing to do whatever may be thought proper to support the President of the United States. It seems to me the suggestion made by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] is entirely right. Let us declare that the boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana is a concern of ours, that we shall maintain it and appropriate the money necessary or asked for by the President for any investigation he may see fit to make for his information in recommending to Congress such action as may be necessary and proper in the case.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that there is too much disposition on the part of Congress to abrogate its functions and invest them in persons outside of this body. I do not see what these commissioners are to do, except to obtain documentary information upon facts which are well known now in the State Department. All the evidence that is necessary to the determination of this question is made public already. It is a matter of history how this claim of boundary has been extended from one point to another until now it embraces a large portion of the territory of Venezuela. We should, I think, sustain the President in his declaration that it is our concern where that boundary line is and where we are to decide it, and if that information is needed appropriate the money to obtain the information.

I should vote for any amendment proposed by the Senator from California to leave the President to his constitutional responsibility of recommending to Congress instead of referring to a commission of three or any other number of men the question which it is incumbent upon Congress to decide, for they can have nothing to do but to obtain documentary evidence which can now be obtained by the Committee on Foreign Relations or by the State Department.

Now, Mr. President, as to all this talk about war, in my opinion there is no possibility of war. There can be, and ought to be, no possibility of it. The enlightened sentiment of the nations of the world would forbid that there should be a war between this country and England upon this question. Nevertheless, it would be the duty of this country to maintain by force of arms the proposition that there shall be no forcible establishment of European institutions and European Governments over any portion of this territory. Who can entertain the idea that war can be made with Great Britain, and that the people of the British Empire will permit that Government to engage in war upon a question of boundaries which is not sustained by the facts of the case, but a mere aggression, and that the peace of mankind shall be disturbed by it?

The Kingdom of Great Britain is composed of a people of the same blood as the greater part of our own people. They have contributed the larger part to the civilization which has been developed by the Christian religion. Her ambassadors to this country have been men of the same blood with ourselves, and have been and are a part of our own race and types of our civilization. Her present ambassador is a man of learning and ability, and while true to the policy of his Government, has been fair and just in his treatment of the contentions between his own Government and ours.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that there is no necessity for haste in this action, and that it comports better with the dignity of Congress for the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives to declare that this Government will firmly maintain, as a definite proposition, that Venezuela shall not be forced to cede any portion of her territory to Great Britain or to recognize a boundary line which is not based upon the facts of history and upon clear and ascertained proof. It seems to me, Mr. President, that all this discussion about war should not have place here, but that we should make a bold and independent and firm declaration as to the proper policy of this Government, and vote the President of the United States the money necessary, in his judgment, to carry out that declaration so far as obtaining information which may be desired.

As to the appointment of three commissioners, or any number of them, to do that which it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to do—not to express an opinion, not to decide this question—but to gather information. What kind of information? Information already obtainable, documentary information, facts of history to be obtained in different portions of the world. What necessity is there for it? What will we derive from the opinion and judgment of these gentlemen, however eminent they may be, that the boundary line is at this place or the other place or that the facts relating to it are of this character or the other? The Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives speak with an authority, in conjunction with the President, which no commission can do, and I fail to see the practical necessity of it. Nevertheless, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to vote these commissioners, I think that their appointment ought to be approved by the Senate of the United States.

The possibility that war between these two nations will be the result of our defending the right of Venezuela to the integrity of her territory against its forced appropriation by England should not be entertained.

These two nations, the United States and Great Britain, are the main pillars of the civilization of the world, neither can afford to demand of the other anything that is wrong or any injustice to the other.

Great Britain recognizes the supremacy of the United States in the Western Hemisphere, and it is sufficient for them to know that we will maintain this with all the power of the Republic, and that this is not an idle menace.

This is my view of the situation. The President has done his duty. He has recommended that the traditional policy of this country to protect all people who establish governments of their choice against forcible intervention by European powers, under whatever pretense, whether by claiming fictitious boundaries and enforcing their claim, or by any other means, and that we will be the judge of this, but that we are ready to submit the facts to the judgment of a fair arbitration. It is sufficient for us to sustain this declaration and for us to provide the means of obtaining the information necessary for an intelligent judgment on the question.

It will suffice for the able statesman who represents the Government of Great Britain to know and to inform his Government that the people of the United States are united in the determination to maintain and defend this policy with all their power, and a peaceable settlement of the question will be made.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I regret that the President of the United States did not settle this question for himself through the regular channel of the State Department. It seems to me that that was the appropriate and proper method of arriving at the facts. But the President has asked us to appropriate money and appoint a commission. What the number of the commission should be, it seems to me, if the commission is to be appointed, ought to be left to the President. I fail to see any advantage that can accrue to the President, to us, to the country, or to the world in the confirmation of these appointees. They are not to be officers in the proper sense of the term. They are not to perform any official functions, legislative, judicial, or otherwise, although the President refers to their finding as a judicial finding. They are simply commissioners for the purpose of enlightening the President of the United States as to the facts in the premises. The power of the President to appoint a commission for this purpose has never been questioned or doubted. It is like a commissioner in a court of chancery; he gathers the facts for the information of the chancellor, and that is all there is of it.

That being the fact, the President of the United States is entitled to select that commission. Suppose he sends to the Senate three names which we think are not such as he might have sent, are we to say through what channel he is to get the facts upon which he will base his judgment? A very awkward condition would arise if he should send to us names that we did not care to approve, and a still more awkward condition would arise if we should reject them, and the President should then feel that we had deprived him of the proper agent or agencies that he wanted to secure the facts for him.

It seems to me it is better to leave this matter where the President evidently intended we should leave it when he simply asked us for the commission and an appropriation to carry out the purposes of the commission. I think it would have been better if the House of Representatives had sent us a bill simply making an appropriation, leaving the President to select a commission in any manner he saw fit and composed of any number he chose, and to call it whatever he saw fit. It would have been none the less a commission whether we named it or not.

Mr. President, we are to have no responsibility in this matter. I am free to say that I prefer to leave this matter with the President. I do not care, so far as I am concerned, to assume any responsibility in arriving at a question of fact. I should think it very unpleasant if we should assume any right to determine the facts in advance of the President's action. It appears to me it would be very embarrassing if we should arrive at one conclusion and the President should arrive at another. It seems to me we must leave to the President both the number of commissioners and the character of the commission that he is to appoint.

I assume, and I have the right to assume, that in a question of such momentous importance, one upon which we are to make our declaration to the world, the finding of which is to be our moral support, the President of the United States will select the most competent men within the boundaries of this country of ours. I do not believe that he will select a mere politician. I believe every Senator here, if there are to be three commissioners, would look most certainly to the same three men in the United States who ought to be appointed on the commission. I should think that the President ought to appoint five on the commission, and I should have no difficulty whatever myself in finding five men in this country so far removed from the plane of partisan politics that everybody in this country would believe when their judgment was rendered that it was the judgment not only of honest men, but intelligent and able men. The President of the United States can not afford to appoint any other men. He can not afford to appoint any second-rate men; and he will not do so. On this great occasion, where so much is at stake, he will see to it that the men will have the confidence of this body and of the American people; and if he does not, let the responsibility be on him.

Mr. President, there is a provision in this proposed amendment to which I also object. It is a provision which releases the President from the inhibition we put on him in 1894 against the appointment for such purposes of men holding official position. I think that was a wise provision of law. I do not wish to restrict it here, because, in my judgment, the men who ought to be appointed upon this commission, the men most fit to be appointed on this commission, the men that the American people will believe the most capable and whose judgment will carry the most weight, are not in public life to-day, and there is no necessity of removing that inhibition. The President does not need to go through the public officials to find members of this commission, whether the number be three, five, or seven.

I was in favor yesterday of some delay, and I still believe a great question of this character should have been treated with more consideration; but it seems to be the sentiment of the Senate that we shall proceed to dispose of it now. I do not believe that it is at all necessary that we should be in haste to convince Great Britain that the American people stand back of the President in his enunciation of the Monroe doctrine. The public press everywhere in this country with one accord, with perhaps two or three exceptions in the city of New York, where certain influences which are more English than in England even may be felt, have been a unit in favor of supporting the President of the United States. I will venture to say that there is not a chamber of commerce or a board of trade anywhere outside of New York that would not be a unit in favor of supporting him. The public sentiment of all the distinguished governors of this country now in office and very many who are out of office, and of very many ex-public officials, including the most noted and distinguished divines in this country, declare that the Monroe doctrine is an American doctrine; that the doctrine is one to be defended and maintained at all hazards.

Mr. President, we are not going to war, we are not preparing for war, and I do not think that the suggestions of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] are particularly pertinent at this time. It is true that our financial affairs are not in the best condition; it is true that the opinion of the Supreme Court, when it struck out of the method of raising revenue the income tax, was a blow at this country which I think can only be retrieved by a different opinion from that court or by an amendment of the Constitution. I do not care now to discuss that question. At some other time I propose to discuss it, but not now. I do not want to mix, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] said, any other question with this question. I do not care about mixing the financial question with it. It is sufficient to say that if the American people feel that their honor requires them to go to war they will find the sinews of war, and nobody need be alarmed for fear that, for the want of means, we shall not be able to conduct it to a successful issue.

I am not frightened by the little disturbance in London, nor am I frightened at the disturbance which is said to exist in the city of New York. Suppose stocks do fall; what of it? That is not a matter that the American people as a nation care very much about. I am told railroad stocks went off 4 points to-day in New York. I do not care if they did. I do not suppose that will affect the price of wheat or of corn or of cotton; it will not affect the country generally, but only a few speculators; and if the English capitalists who hold our securities conclude that they want to return them to this country, let them return them. We shall not suffer by that. They will return them here to be put upon our markets and sold, and if they fall 20 points or 40 points or 50 points we need not be disturbed about it. We shall find plenty of money in this country to take them up at those reduced values. Those securities will not be sent back to this country. That is "a bluff" on their part. The Senator from New Hampshire read of their meeting, but he did not read it all. I want to read a word or two:

> Most of those present refused to believe that the American people would seriously indorse his action. They opposed any suggestion of financial retaliation against American interests on the magnanimous ground that it would be unfair to punish the whole nation on account of the conduct of its deluded Chief Magistrate. No one believes that any actual danger of war is included in the present situation.
> The meeting finally resolved, with practical unanimity, to postpone any action until it became clear to what extent the President's course represented the will of the American people.

Mr. President, when they have gone to the American press and listened to the voice of the American people, if their sending back their securities depends upon the support we shall give to the President, they will send back those securities en masse; but they will not come back and they will know that the President has the hearty support of the American people. I know, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, telegrams are being sent here that we must be careful, that our action may affect trade. No consideration of that kind is going to induce the American people to abandon a doctrine which they cherish. No mere question of money is going to prevent the people of the United States from maintaining what they think to be the right and the dignity and the honor of this nation.

We sacrificed one-half of the accumulations of two hundred years to maintain the integrity of this nation. In my judgment, the people of the United States, whenever they know the facts, whenever they are satisfied there is a violation of the Monroe doctrine, whenever they are satisfied that Great Britain, under the pretense of fixing a boundary line, is endeavoring to despoil a Republic in South America, will be prepared to take the consequences of the vindication of that doctrine. I do not myself believe that there will be any trouble of the kind; I do not think there ought to be. I think there ought to be some way to compose this difficulty, and I believe there will be. I do not care myself of talking so much about war. I regret that anybody in this Chamber has introduced any bill which looks as if we needed now to make some special preparations. I should not be making any preparations now that I would not have been making thirty or sixty days or six months ago.

The best thing we can do, in my judgment, is not to adopt the amendment of the committee, but take the bill as it came from the other House, and leave the responsibility with the President, so that he will be untrammeled by anything we may do, and when a decision is arrived at, whatever it may be, if it be that the British have not attempted to despoil Venezuela, we shall accept it; if, on the other hand, it be that they have been intending to despoil Venezuela of her territory, and England still insists upon that spoliation, then the American people will know exactly what to do, and Great Britain will know long before that time exactly what our determination is, and what it will cost her to continue the unrighteous attempt of the spoliation of this our sister Republic.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, will forgive me if I move, as I do now, to lay the amendment proposed by the committee on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire has my free pardon in advance upon this subject, because it is not my report, and I am going to vote with him upon that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. CHANDLER. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] be laid upon the table. The question is on that motion, which is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CAFFERY. Is the bill subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has passed the amendment stage. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BATE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the Senate resumed its legislative session.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for a holiday recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid the resolution before the Senate, and it was read, as follows:

> Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 20th day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Friday, January 3, 1896.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to suggest as an amendment that instead of Friday, the 20th, we fix Saturday, the 21st instant, and instead of Friday, January 3, we fix Monday, January 6, so as to read, "That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 21st instant, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, January 6." Everyone knows that if we adjourn to meet on Friday, January 3, there will be nobody here and nothing will be done, and we had just as well put the time over to the 6th. I suggest those amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. The resolution now provides for adjourning from to-day until the 3d of January. The Senator from Missouri proposes that the two Houses shall adjourn from to-morrow until the 6th of January. I am opposed to adjourning to-morrow. It will be the first time in the history of the Senate, I think, when the Senate has adjourned a fortnight over the holidays with a hundred vacancies on its committees. There has been a great deal said within the last few days about the importance of the crisis that is now upon the country, and we have had a good deal of talk about foreign questions. What will be said of the Senate if, for the first time in its history, we adjourn for a fortnight and have not any committees, or have committees that are halt, lame, blind, so to speak, with all due deference to the Senators who are upon the committees and with all due respect to the Senators who are not upon the committees?

The new Senators who are in this body were elected mainly last January. They have had ten months to get ready to come here and do business, and the old Senators have had eight months in which to get ready to come here and do business; and here we are. We have been here three weeks. There never was a time when the committees were more in need of organization and of meeting for action than now, and it is gravely proposed by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber that we shall abandon our posts and go home.

I regret, Mr. President, that the members of the Committee on Appropriations upon the other side of the Chamber felt compelled to take advantage of a temporary party majority to overrule by a vote all the Republican members of the committee and undertook to set the example to the country which is being set, of running away for a fortnight from our post of duty. I certainly expected more forbearance from the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Maryland, who I see has already taken the floor to reply to what I have said.

Mr. GORMAN. No, I have not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I thought the Senator was meditating a speech.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I certainly thought that there would not be any attempt to divide parties on this question of adjournment. It seems to me that we should stay here until next Tuesday; that between now and Tuesday we should fill up the committees, as harmoniously as we always have filled them up, and then adjourn until the 3d day of January.

Mr. LODGE. Until the 6th.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; until the 3d day of January. That would be more than a week. Can it be possible that the Senator from Massachusetts is already getting tired of his work at this session of Congress? No, let us adjourn until the 3d of January. I propose that we shall stay here until Tuesday; that on Tuesday we shall fill up the committees, and then take a week's holiday adjournment. I deprecate very much the attempt on the part of the majority members of the Committee on Appropriations to force an unbecoming and an unseemly adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I regret very much that I can not agree with my distinguished friend from New Hampshire. On the other hand, I believe that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have treated us with great consideration. They have allowed us to organize the Senate, so far as they are concerned. They have interposed no objection at all, notwithstanding the fact, which everybody knows, that we are not in the majority in the Senate. We have taken three weeks or more to frame our committees, at any rate since the beginning of the session. Now we ask them in two days or three days to do what it took us that long to accomplish. They are confronted with difficulties; I do not care whether they are serious or not; it is for them to decide that. They say to us that they can not complete the committees properly in this short time. I say, in view of the courtesy with which we have been treated on this side, we have no right to question that statement at all. If we undertake on this side of the Chamber to stay here next week and force the other side to organize, we shall make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the country. It is absurd——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator says that the other side of the Chamber have informed us that they can not be ready. The Senator may have relations with Senators upon the other side of the Chamber that I myself do not now possess, but I have heard no statement of that kind made as yet. I have heard no statement made that——

Mr. DUBOIS. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will answer that question. I presume it is fair to state what was done in our caucus. I hope I am not out of order in stating that our caucus gave plenary powers to the chairman of our caucus committee to confer with the chairman on the other side in regard to these details, and they have stated to him (which any Senator could have known if he desired) that they can not get these committees together in that time; and the chairman of our caucus stated that to us in our caucus.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is, I think, mistaken.

Mr. DUBOIS. Perhaps I am, but the chairman certainly made that statement. It has been stated to me, and to any others who have taken an interest in the matter; and it is apparent on the face of it that if we undertake to stay here we shall find ourselves without a quorum next Monday. I think we had better adjourn. If there has been any fault, it is not due to any action on the other side of the Chamber in delaying the creation of the committees.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, I will simply state that when the list of the majority portion of the committees was handed over to the Democrats, in order that they might fill up the minority places, I said to them that it was the hope on the part of our side that they would be able to finish their work by to-day—on Friday. The chairman of their committee, representing them, stated that they would go to work at once and call their committee together the next morning and proceed. He thought that was a very short time, but if it was possible to get ready they would do it. The matter went on until yesterday, and again to-day, when I have been informed by their committee that it is impossible, they think, for them to get ready this week. I then said to them, "Is it not possible that you might be able to complete your work by next Tuesday, and, if you are willing to say that you can complete your work by that time, I am sure we will remain here, so far as Senators on this side of the Chamber are concerned." I was then given to understand that it would be impossible to do it by next week. That is about the state of the case as I understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator when he was so informed?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I was informed yesterday by some of the committee, and again to-day, within the last hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. That it would be impossible for the other side to be ready by Tuesday?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That it would be impossible for the other side to complete their work by next Tuesday.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Oregon has stated the facts. We stated to him on the very day that we were furnished with a copy of the committees that we would do the very best we could; that it was doubtful in the condition we were in whether it would be possible to finish it to-day or to-morrow or even Tuesday, but that we would do the best we could; and we notified him yesterday, and again to-day, that we saw no probability of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is the first time when I have been informed that the other side would find it impossible to complete their propositions as to committee membership by Tuesday next. I have always understood the contrary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that is the fact and it would have been known to everybody, but I had no opportunity to communicate the matter generally because we had no caucus. However, I told quite a number nearest to me and everyone who inquired concerning the matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. I also knew the fact that there was a party division in the committee of which the Senator from Missouri is chairman on the question of adjournment for the holidays; and I generally stand by my party until I am satisfied that it is wrong.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised at the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire and his criticism of this side in regard to delay in the organization of the committees. When it was understood that in all probability there would not be a clear majority in this body between the two great parties, the Democratic and the Republican parties, both sides, after conference at the last session, agreed to pass a resolution, for the second time in the history of the Senate, continuing all the committees until otherwise ordered by the Senate, so as to prevent the possibility of any delay in important public matters. In that condition the Senate stands to-day.

Those of us on this side are perfectly well aware of the fact that there are only 39 Democrats. There were only 42 gentlemen elected as Republicans on the other side of the Chamber. You are powerless, as we supposed at the last session you would be, with your own numbers to organize the Senate. We have, however, a less number of votes than you have, and, therefore, when you desired to assume the responsibility of taking charge of the committees of this body we were content that you should do it in your own way and by your own combination. Three weeks, as was well said by the distinguished Senator in front of me, you have consumed in trying to make an arrangement of committees satisfactory to yourselves—three weeks of time when there was nothing pressing in the Senate, when all day was at the disposal of your committee and your caucus to make your adjustment. On Wednesday evening last, late in the afternoon, I was informed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon of the result of your deliberations. It was not possible to call our committee together until the next day at 12 o'clock; members could not be reached.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was it on Tuesday or Wednesday?

Mr. GORMAN. It was on Wednesday. From that time this great question, which affects not only the honor of the Senate, but of the country, has been pressing here, and we have been continuously in session yesterday and to-day until a very late hour, making it impossible for us to confer. I will say to Senators on the other side that we postponed any minor matter of the mere assignment on committees of vacant places or the reorganization to the public good, and now, as with those on the other side, there are other questions to be adjusted; there are family matters requiring attention. Never in my experience in the Senate before have the minority been taken to task because of a delay of three or four days in the formation of committees. When we were in the majority, all the time that was necessary in your judgment was accorded you without any public criticism.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland a question. To-day is Friday. Do I understand him to say that day before yesterday he got the notice and that only yesterday he called the committee together?

Mr. GORMAN. Day before yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The list of committees on the part of the majority was delivered to the Senator Tuesday night, about 6 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. It was on Wednesday morning that the committee was called. I stand corrected.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I stated the correct history of the matter.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then this side has had the last two days, when you have had three weeks.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. While we have been three weeks on our part of the work, the fact of the matter is, as we all know, that no movement was made by any Senator to take action in regard to the committees until after we had been here a number of days. After our committee was appointed we did have twelve days to do our work.

Mr. GORMAN. As has been said before, the chairman of the committee on the other side was informed, and informed frankly, that we would dispose of this matter just as rapidly as it could be done. It could not be done within the time indicated on the other side, in view of what has occurred here in legislative matters. It will be impossible to do it in the next two on three days.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to say one word further. I do not believe the Democrats have had time enough to complete their part of the work between the time that we delivered our list to them, which was last Tuesday evening at 6 o'clock, and to-day. Perhaps they would not have time by to-morrow. But I have thought, and I still think, that they could accomplish their work and that they ought to accomplish their work, by next Monday or Tuesday, and that we ought to remain here, if that could be done, and organize the committees before we adjourn for the holidays.

Mr. GORMAN. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon, who must know the fact as well as I do, that whatever are the deliberations of a caucus committee they must be submitted to the main body, and it will be utterly impossible to have a quorum here after to-day.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether it is not also true that in filling these vacancies, or in attempting to assign or to take from committees, it is the custom to consult, to some extent at least, with gentlemen who are interested in the matters, and whether it is not a fact that Senators have been absent with whom we have desired to consult?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, of course.

Mr. WHITE. That difficulty will be more apparent the nearer we approach the holidays.

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I beg to make a disclaimer. The Senator from Maryland said he was surprised that I had criticised the other side for delaying in preparing their list of committees. I made no such criticism. I think the Senators should take all the time they need. I am too familiar with the grandeur and the sweetness of what is called Senatorial courtesy to wish to infringe in the slightest degree upon the privilege of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber in taking what time they say in good faith they need for that purpose. What I did criticise was the desire to adjourn. I never have thought (the Senator from Maryland knows it very well) that the Senators whom he represents would be ready by Friday. I did think they might be ready by Tuesday next. I never have been informed until this moment that Senators think they need longer than Tuesday next.

Now, then, we had a party division for some reason in the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee yesterday reported, by a bare party vote, a resolution to adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator want to know? I supposed he knew.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know. I do not know everything that takes place.

Mr. COCKRELL. Senators desired that the business which has been transacted to-day should be disposed of before the adjournment was fixed, and that being disposed of, I understand that they interpose no further objection to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. And it is done with no desire to delay the appointment of committees?

Mr. COCKRELL. With no desire to delay the appointment of the committees. Now, I hope that the amendments which I have proposed to the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. That being the case, if it is stated by Senators on the other side of the Chamber not merely that they can not be ready to-day or to-morrow, but that they can not be ready even on Tuesday next, I am content.

Mr. WHITE. That is the statement made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I hope the resolution will be amended and agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments of the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. In line 2 strike out the words "Friday, the 20th," and insert "Saturday, the 21st;" in the last line strike out "Friday" and insert "Monday," and strike out "3d" and insert "6th;" so as to read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, the 21st day of December, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, January 6, 1896.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the second and final amendment?

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the resolution as amended?

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE ON VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 2,000 additional copies of the message from the President of the United States relative to the Venezuelan boundary controversy and correspondence with the British Government on the subject, being Senate Document No. 31, present session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I object for the moment. I desire to ask the leader of the opposition whether it would not be well, before the resolution for adjournment that has just been concurred in is sent to the other House, that we should wait and see what the message is which the President is to send us, for that message may create a crisis in public affairs that will make it important for us to stay here.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, there is no danger of a crisis.

Mr. GORMAN. This resolution provides for a mere reprint.

Mr. CHANDLER. How are we to know that there is no danger of a crisis?

Mr. COCKRELL. In the very nature of the condition of this country and this people no crisis is possible.

Mr. CHANDLER. But how improper it will be to pass a resolution providing for the adjournment of Congress to-morrow for a fortnight when we are specially requested to remain here in session until His Excellency the President will send us a special communication, which no one knows anything about.

Mr. GORMAN. This resolution is only for a reprint of the recent message. There is not a copy left in the document room, I understand. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPOSED RECONSIDERATION OF HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the Senate will not adjourn. A message from the President is now on its way here. I have just received a telegram to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his motion?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose we shall have to wait a little while.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the resolution for adjournment, and I yield the floor to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the concurrent adjournment resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for a division.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table, there being on a division—ayes 32, noes not counted.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

Mr. PEFFER. May we not take up the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill on the Calendar will be announced.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment has been offered to the pending bill. The bill is open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand that we are proceeding under Rule VIII. I do not like to proceed to a vote upon this bill to-day. I am to blame; I did not listen very carefully, but if I had done so I do not think that five minutes would have been time enough for the consideration of the bill. I shall not interpose a factious objection, but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the bill is not being considered under Rule VIII, with any limit of debate, it being after 2 o'clock; but if the Senate proceeds with its consideration it will be under Rule IX, without limit as to debate.

Mr. GORMAN. Has the bill been referred to a committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been reported from a committee.

Mr. GORMAN. From what committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

Mr. MILLS. The bill contains a provision for a permanent appropriation. Some years ago Congress undertook to repeal all the laws on the statute books that contained permanent appropriations, intending to keep the appropriations of the Government in the hands of each Congress and subject each act of appropriation to the inspection of the Committees on Appropriations. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations for their consideration, and I move that that reference be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves to commit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Texas will not insist upon that motion. This bill has been before the Senate for some time. It was referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and it was reported by authority of the committee favorably, without amendment. One day I spent about an hour in the discussion of this measure. I had the honor of talking to empty benches most of the time; so I do not wonder that most Senators did not hear what was said; but the remarks made upon that occasion were so full of interest to the newspaper people of the country that I have had many comments of the press sent me. I would not be surprised, if they were counted, if they would foot up as many as five hundred different newspaper comments, and not one of them has been unfavorable. I have three of them in my pocket now; one from the Republican, of Springfield, Mass., an old-established and a very able paper, commenting favorably upon the bill; also one from the Louisville (Ky.) Commercial, and a number of others from the best papers of the country.

But, Mr. President, aside from all that, I gave to the Senate a history of the proceedings of the Senate and of the other House in cases of the deaths of members of these two bodies. So far as the Senate is concerned, the record began in 1790, and it comes on down until 1894, when the last death occurred in this body. I collected the statistical information in connection with all of those deaths, the amount of money that was paid out of the public Treasury on account of them, and I found that so far as the Senate itself is concerned the aggregate amount was something over $100,000. While the amount itself is not very large, yet it appears that upon these occasions as they recur the expense is constantly increasing, until it has come now to be an average of over $4,000 in each case of the death of a Senator during the last ten years. The number of deaths occurring during the last ten years has cost the Treasury more money by several thousand dollars than the deaths of all the rest of the Senators who have died during the existence of the Senate. These facts have been presented to the Senate, and most Senators probably have read the information printed in the RECORD, as usual in such cases, the morning after the delivery of the speech.

If any Senator wishes delay for the sake of information or for the purpose of considering the bill upon its merits further, I have no objection to that course.

So far as the suggestion of the Senator from Texas is concerned, that the bill provides for a permanent appropriation, it simply provides that when there is any expense incurred under the bill the amount shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States instead of——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will please suspend. The Senate will receive a message from the President of the United States.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, communicated to the Senate a message in writing.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the doors of the Senate be opened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The formal entry will be made that the Senate has resumed the consideration of legislative business, if there be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. That the doors be opened.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Congress:

In my last annual message the evils of our present financial system were plainly pointed out and the causes and means of the depletion of Government gold were explained. It was therein stated that after all the efforts that had been made by the executive branch of the Government to protect our gold reserve by the issuance of bonds amounting to more than $162,000,000, such reserve then amounted to but little more than $79,000,000, that about $16,000,000 had been withdrawn from such reserve during the month next previous to the date of that message, and that quite large withdrawals for shipment in the immediate future were predicted.

The contingency then feared has reached us, and the withdrawals of gold since the communication referred to, and others that appear inevitable, threaten such a depletion in our Government gold reserve as brings us face to face to the necessity of further action for its protection. This condition is intensified by the prevalence in certain quarters of sudden and unusual apprehension and timidity in business circles.

We are in the midst of another season of perplexity caused by our dangerous and fatuous financial operations. These may be expected to recur with certainty as long as there is no amendment in our financial system. If, in this particular instance, our predicament is at all influenced by a recent insistence upon the position we should occupy in our relation to certain questions concerning our foreign policy, this furnishes a signal and impressive warning that even the patriotic sentiment of our people is not an adequate substitute for a sound financial policy.

Of course there can be no doubt in any thoughtful mind as to the complete solvency of our nation, nor can there be any just apprehension that the American people will be satisfied with less than an honest payment of our public obligations in the recognized money of the world. We should not overlook the fact, however, that aroused fear is unreasoning and must be taken into account in all efforts to avert possible loss and the sacrifice of our people's interests.

The real and sensible cure for our recurring troubles can only be effected by a complete change in our financial scheme. Pending that, the executive branch of the Government will not relax its efforts nor abandon its determination to use every means within its reach to maintain before the world American credit, nor will there be any hesitation in exhibiting its confidence in the resources of our country and the constant patriotism of our people.

In view, however, of the peculiar situation now confronting us, I have ventured to herein express the earnest hope that the Congress, in default of the inauguration of a better system of finance, will not take a recess from its labors before it has, by legislative enactment or declaration, done something not only to remind those apprehensive among our own people that the resources of their Government and a scrupulous regard for honest dealing afford a sure guaranty of unquestioned safety and soundness, but to reassure the world that with these factors, and the patriotism of our citizens, the ability and determination of our nation to meet in any circumstances every obligation it incurs do not admit of question.

I ask at the hands of the Congress such prompt aid as it alone has the power to give to prevent, in a time of fear and apprehension, any sacrifice of the people's interests and the public funds or the impairment of our public credit in an effort by Executive action to relieve the dangers of the present emergency.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 20, 1895.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. I expected some consideration from our Democratic friends of this very serious message.

Mr. COCKRELL. We want time to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 21, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

A letter from the Public Printer, relating to the reprinting of Senate Document No. 226, first session Fiftieth Congress (Venezuelan boundary); which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Also, letters from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of Chief of Engineers with examination and survey of the following river and harbor improvements; which were severally referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, namely:

Stonington Harbor, Connecticut; Rockland Harbor, Maine; Rock Island Harbor, Rhode Island.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of appropriation for material and miscellaneous expenses for Bureau of Engraving and Printing for fiscal year 1896 for purchase of articles provided for in appropriation for miscellaneous expenses of Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of same for remaining portion of fiscal year 1896.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to joint resolution (S. Res. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-houses at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes, relative to ports of entry, having been duly enrolled, was signed by the Speaker.

UNITED STATES COURTS, IOWA.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2264) fixing the times for holding the circuit and district courts for the northern district of Iowa and for the southern district of Iowa.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter terms of circuit and district courts of the United States shall be held in the several divisions of the northern district of Iowa as follows:

In the Cedar Rapids division, at Cedar Rapids, on the first Tuesday in April and on the second Tuesday in September.

In the eastern division, at Dubuque, on the fourth Tuesday in April and the first Tuesday in December.

In the western division, at Sioux City, on the fourth Tuesday in May and the first Tuesday in October.

In the central division, at Fort Dodge, on the second Tuesday in June and the second Tuesday in November.

SEC. 2. That hereafter terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States shall be held in the several divisions of the southern district of Iowa as follows:

In the western division, at Council Bluffs, on the second Tuesday in March and the third Tuesday in September.

In the eastern division, at Keokuk, on the second Tuesday in April and the third Tuesday in October.

In the central division, at Des Moines, on the second Tuesday in May and the third Tuesday in November.

SEC. 3. That no action, suit, proceeding, information, indictment, recognizance, bail bond, or other process in any of said courts shall abate or be rendered invalid by reason of the change of time in the holding of the terms of said courts, but the same shall be deemed to be returnable to and pending and triable at the terms provided for in this act.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I would like to make a brief statement, Mr. Speaker, before the request for unanimous consent is presented.

This bill simply changes the time of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States in the district of Iowa, and the change is made at the request of both judges and at the request of the members of the bar, so far as they have been consulted. The proposed change has been fully discussed in the State of Iowa by the bar and notices inserted in the newspapers to all parties interested, and all concur in the desirability of the change.

Mr. TERRY. Does this impose any additional expense on the Government?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Not a dollar.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say that I brought this matter to the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who was a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and he is cognizant of the provisions of the bill. It is purely a local matter to our State, changing the terms of the courts. The members of the bar, the judges, and the entire delegation in Congress are united in asking the change.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the courts are already held at the points which are designated in this bill?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. At all of them.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the bill affect anything except the time of holding the courts?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Nothing at all except the time of holding the courts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ROPOSED ELECTION CONTEST, FIRST DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read. It proposes that J. J. McDonald be allowed to contest the right to the seat of W. A. Jones, from the First Congressional district of Virginia, and that he be allowed thirty days from and after the passage of the resolution in which to serve notice of contest.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CRISP. To make the point that I think this resolution should go to the Committee on Elections. All questions relating to the right of a member to his seat and to the election of members should go to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman will permit me, I think there is no objection to its going to the Committee on Elections, but the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] has a petition that ought to accompany the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Michigan desires it to go to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the only objection to the passage of this resolution would be the competency of the reasons why the notice of contest was not given within the specified time, and to accompany the resolution and as a part of my remarks I send up the following statement.

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that this should be referred without debate, under the rules, to the Committee on Elections. There are a great many of these cases, as the gentleman from Michigan knows. There are thirty-two cases just like this waiting for reference to the Committees on Elections when they are appointed, and, as I understand it, this is a new case.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing that it should go to the Committee on Elections, but I desire to have this sworn petition accompany the resolution and be printed in the RECORD, and if that can be done without reading I will consent to that.

Mr. CRISP. I think, Mr. Speaker, this ought to go to the Committee on Elections under Rule XI.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any objection to the petition accompanying it to the committee?

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to his referring anything that he desires to refer, but not to be printed in the RECORD, because that might do injustice to somebody.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not insist upon that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this ought to go to the Committee on Elections.

ANNUAL REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution of the Senate which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, in paper covers, 6,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS OF CUBA.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to have read and printed in the RECORD a numerously signed petition from the people of my district, asking that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom, and that the same may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] arks to have read a petition which he has described, and that the same be printed in the RECORD. It requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that it may seem to be somewhat ungracious to object to this request, but it is establishing a wrong precedent. I notice that in the other branch of Congress some of these documents have been printed in the RECORD, but it is not proper. Only two days ago I noticed in the proceedings of the Senate for one day not less than six petitions and memorials. If they are to keep up that practice I shall not continue to object to it on this side. The rules of the House require that petitions and memorials shall be sent to committees, and they are not printed in the RECORD. It is apparent to all that if the RECORD is given up to these matters its volume will be swelled to an enormous extent, and its value much impaired. I am therefore constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee, and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under authority of section 5581 of the Revised Statutes, announces the appointment of the following Regents of the Smithsonian Institution:

Mr. ROBERT R. HITT, of Illinois; Mr. ROBERT ADAMS, jr., of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JOSEPH WHEELER, of Alabama.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

Until after the holidays:

To Mr. TRACEWELL, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLARDY, on account of important business.

To Mr. HULING, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILLER, of West Virginia, on account of important business.

To Mr. BULL, on account of important business.

To Mr. HALL, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. KULP, for this day, on account of important business.

To Mr. OTJEN, for this day, on account of important business.

DECEMBER SALARIES OF HOUSE AND SENATE EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for one hour.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes) the House was declared in recess.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 1 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending that motion, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

The motion was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2549) for the relief of the estate of Marius B. Cawthon, deceased, late of Madison County, Ala.—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2550) for the relief of William A. Watkins, of St. Florian, Ala.—to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMS: Resolutions of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia relating to the tariff—to the Committee on Mauufactures.

By Mr. CROWTHER: Petition of citizens of Missouri, praying for an honorable discharge for William Miers, late private, Company F, Ninth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Patrick Rainey, late of Company K, Fifty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DINSMORE: Petition to remove the charge of desertion against Greer Smith—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition to remove the charge of desertion against John D. Culp—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: Resolution of Board of Trade of Whitcom, State of Washington, relative to cultivation of flax fiber in certain counties in said State—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HENDERSON: Resolutions by the Commandery of Iowa, Military Order of the Loyal Legion, favoring the establishment of a national military park at Vicksburg, Miss.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HICKS: Petition of H. L. Africa, James Pritchard, Erne D. Mock, A. C. Reefsnyder, E. E. Kendig, J. L. Barchus, Alex. N. Hast, and 950 other citizens of Blair, Cambria, Bedford, and Somerset counties, of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of a law (the William A. Stone bill of the Fifty-third Congress) restricting foreign immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Alma Lodge, No. 523, I. O. O. F., of Johnstown, Pa., praying for passage of House bill granting relief to Odd Fellows' Hall Association of New Orleans, La.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KIEFER: Resolution passed by the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minn., requesting Congress to grant the people of Cuba belligerent rights—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LACEY: Petition of Marcus D. Box, of Davis County, Iowa, for increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut: Petition of Connecticut general assembly for investigation of the case of Dorence Atwater—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Illinois: Petition to reclassify and prescribe salaries of railway postal clerks—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SPERRY: Petition of citizens of New Haven, Conn., asking Congress to take such action as shall result in the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petition for a pension for John A. Hipkins—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNE: Petition of F. W. Johnson, John Ojanpera, August Flood, and 365 others, of Wright County, Minn., praying that Congress take no action to restore the greenbacks, and against any legislation giving banks greater privileges than they now enjoy, and for the coinage of silver bullion now in the Treasury—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. THOMAS: Petition of James J. McDonald to the House of Representatives of the United States, praying that he be admitted as a contestant for the seat now held by W. A. JONES, First district of Virginia—to the Committee on Elections.

By Mr. WATSON of Indiana: Resolution adopted by Buffalo Tribe, No. 109, Improved Order of Red Men, indorsing the President's message on the Venezuelan matter—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of C. McDonald, executor, of Madison County, State of Alabama, praying that the Committee on War Claims refer his claim, together with all papers and proofs relating thereto which were submitted to the Southern Claims Commission, to the Court of Claims under act of March 3, 1883—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 21, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONGRATULATION OF BRAZILIAN SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of State; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 21, 1895.

SIR: The Brazilian minister at this capital, acting under instructions of his Government, informs me that on yesterday both houses of Congress of the United States of Brazil passed unanimously a motion of congratulation on the subject of the message of President Cleveland of the 17th instant, and that the Federal Senate of Brazil asks that its motion be transmitted through the usual diplomatic channel to the Senate of the United States of America.

I have, therefore, to ask that the motion of the Federal Senate of Brazil, which is in the terms following: "The Federal Senate of the United States of Brazil sends its greeting to the Senate of the United States of America upon the worthy message of President Cleveland, who so strenuously guards the dignity, the sovereignty, and the freedom of the American nations," be laid before the Senate.

Very respectfully, RICHARD OLNEY.

Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON,
Vice-President of the United States, United States Senate.

REPORT OF THE COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Columbia Railway Company of Washington, D. C., for the fiscal year ended June 28, 1895, together with an abstract of receipts and disbursements of the corporation from its organization, September 1, 1871, to March 1, 1895; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at the fifteenth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of Benjamin J. Berry, president of the Massachusetts Ship Canal Company, praying that reasonable aid be afforded by the Government in the construction of a ship canal from Massachusetts Bay to Nantucket Sound, across Cape Cod, at Bass River, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of 374 legal voters and citizens of Lancaster County, S. C., remonstrating against the abridgment of the rights of citizenship in the State of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Eufaula, Ala., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Apalachicola, Fla., praying that an appropriation of $300,000 be made for improving and deepening the harbor of Apalachicola, Fla.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of citizens of Pueblo, Colo., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a communication from the secretary of the board of directors of the Merchants' Exchange of St.

Louis, Mo., stating that at a meeting of the Merchants' Exchange, held on the 17th instant, it was declared to be the sentiment of the members that Congress should grant belligerent rights to the people of Cuba now struggling for their independence. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PROF. S. H. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report a resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas on March 2, 1895, it was resolved by the Senate "that the Committee on Rules be directed to report at the next session of Congress whether any improvement can be made in the ventilation of the Senate Chamber;" and

Whereas in carrying out the provisions of said resolution the said committee caused to be employed Prof. S. H. Woodbridge, of the Boston Institute of Technology, to make a thorough investigation of the Senate wing of the Capitol and report to them a plan for the improvement of the ventilation of the Senate Chamber; and

Whereas the said Woodbridge has made said investigation and report to the said Committee on Rules: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay said S. H. Woodbridge, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the sum of $1,022.27, being for the expenses incurred by the said Woodbridge in making said investigation and preparing said report thereon, and for his services; said payment to be made upon voucher to be approved by the Committee on Rules and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Kentucky that the resolution must, under the rule, go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the resolution provides expressly that the payment shall be made upon voucher to be approved by both the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Contingent Expenses, so that the resolution, if agreed to by the Senate, will not take effect until it has gone through the hands of both the Committee on Rules and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky for the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF THE MESSAGES OF THE PRESIDENTS.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution authorizing the Public Printer to employ clerical aid in copying the messages of the Presidents of the United States from the Journals of the Senate, etc., for the printing thereof, to report it with an amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in line 8, after the word "therefor," to insert "not to exceed $600;" so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized to employ such clerical aid as he may find necessary in the copying, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, of the messages of the Presidents of the United States from the Journals of the Senate and House and the Executive Journals for the printing thereof, and that the expense therefor, not to exceed $600, be paid out of the appropriation for public printing and binding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1140) to permit the Home Telephone Company of Washington, D. C., to install, maintain, and operate a telephone and telegraph plant and exchange in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1141) for the relief of Catherine Burns, of Annapolis, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 1142) for the relief of James C. McCartney, of Gardiner, Mont.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1143) to provide for the location and purchase of public lands for reservoir sites, and granting right of way for water ditches and irrigating canals over public lands in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and the States of Montana, Idaho, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 1144) granting a pension to Miss Virginia Howland; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1145) granting a pension to Mrs. Emma L. Kimble; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1146) granting an increase of pension to William Emerson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 1147) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry for the inspection of meat products and live stock, suppression and extirpation of contagious and infectious diseases among cattle and live stock, to regulate the transportation of cattle and live stock, and prevent the exportation or importation of diseased cattle, live stock, or other animals, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1148) granting a pension to Celesthia A. Whitney; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1149) granting a pension to Sophia J. Chilcott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1150) granting a pension to Lucinda S. Twombly; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1151) providing for the construction and equipment of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1152) for the relief of Henry H. Wheeler, of Crook County, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1153) for the development and encouragement of silk, flax, and ramie culture, and their preparation and manufacture in the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1154) for the relief of the sufferers by the capture and destruction of the Hawaiian whaling vessel Harvest; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 1155) for the relief of Lieut. Jerome E. Morse, of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1156) for the relief of Charles Gallagher, and to refer his claims to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1157) granting a pension to Maria L. Carbee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 1158) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and to provide for the payment of all claims for the use and occupation of church, college, and school buildings for Government purposes by the United States military authorities, and the value of any such building destroyed during such occupation by the United States, and all claims for repairs to any such buildings and the furniture of same rendered necessary by such occupation by the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 32) authorizing and directing the acceptance of the ram Katahdin, thereby making said ram a part of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

Mr. SQUIRE. In the early part of the session I introduced a bill (S. 334) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses, and made a brief explanation of it at the time. Since that bill was introduced there have been some changes in the condition of affairs and in the public mind, and I wish to introduce to-day another bill, or rather the same bill with an emergency clause included, not changing any of the language of the original bill as it was drafted except to put in at the end of the first section the words "the whole or any part of this appropriation to be immediately available if so ordered by the President," and in the second section, after the words "as follows," to insert the words "unless otherwise ordered by the President." This bill ought to be considered in the Committee on Coast Defenses at an early date, and I hope that our friends on the other side will consent to the prompt organization of that committee. I conceive that the condition of public affairs is such that extraordinary powers should be vested in the President to provide for public defense in case of emergency. If the emergency does not occur, then we shall simply pursue the work deliberately, as provided for in the bill. I am advised that we are all ready with our plans for defense and all that is needed is money to press forward with energy. This bill is not the result of any sudden outburst of patriotic feeling. It is a well-matured measure, proceeding upon systematic lines to carry out a great public purpose.

The bill (S. 1159) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask that the bill be read at the desk as now introduced. It will take but a few moments.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of providing the fortifications and other defenses recommended by the board appointed by the President under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act making provisions for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, for the ports named in the report of the said board as the ports at which fortifications are most urgently needed, namely, New York, San Francisco, Boston, the lake ports, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore; Portland, Me.; Rhode Island ports in Narragansett Bay, Key West; Charleston, S. C.; Mobile, New London, Savannah, Galveston; Portland, Oreg.; Pensacola, Fla.; Wilmington, N. C.; San Diego, Cal.; Portsmouth, N. H.; defenses of Cumberland Sound at Fort Clinch, defenses of ports of the Kennebec River at Fort Popham; New Bedford, Mass.; defenses of ports on the Penobscot River, Maine; at Fort Knox and New Haven, Conn., and further for the defense of Puget Sound, and of such other ports as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may require permanent works of fortification, there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $87,000,000, the whole or any part of the appropriation to be immediately available if so ordered by the President.

SEC. 2. That said appropriation shall be available only as follows unless otherwise ordered by the President: For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, $1,500,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, $5,500,000; and for each fiscal year thereafter for the period of ten years, $8,000,000; all of said appropriation to be available until expended.

SEC. 3. That said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and under existing laws for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses for the ports aforesaid and the armament thereof and the purchase of sites for the said fortifications, substantially in accordance with the recommendations of said board, with such modifications as are made in the more extended study of the individual projects, as approved from time to time by the Secretary of War, until Congress shall otherwise provide, and shall be apportioned among the said ports in accordance with the consolidated estimate of the cost of said defenses in so far as may be most economical and expedient; and the work shall be, as near as may be, commenced at the same time at each of the said ports, and shall proceed as rapidly as said annual appropriations will admit of, excepting at the lake ports, where fortifications shall not be begun until in the judgment of the President work there shall be necessary and expedient: Provided, That should any material change in the total estimates for the defenses herein provided for be made necessary, a full and complete statement of such changes and the reasons therefor shall be laid before Congress for its action: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated applicable for the defensive works at a port shall be expended for fortifications at that port until the Secretary of War shall have caused the survey necessary to select a proper site to be made and a detailed project to be prepared for that port, not to exceed in cost the sum apportioned to that port included in the total amount herein appropriated for said fortifications and shall have approved the same.

SEC. 4. The proportion of the above sums to be expended in each year by the Chief of Engineers of the Army on fortifications and procurement of sites therefor, who is charged by law with the performance of these duties, and the proportion to be expended by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army on the armament of the fortifications, who is charged by law with the performance of this duty, shall be determined by the Secretary of War at the beginning of each fiscal year, and said sums shall be expended in strict conformity with existing laws and regulations.

VICE-CONSULS AT ERZERUM AND HARPOOT.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate whether the exequaturs of the American vice-consuls duly appointed to the consulates of Erzerum and Harpoot have been withheld or refused by the Turkish Government, while exequaturs were granted to the consuls of other nations at the same points.

COAST-DEFENSE ESTIMATES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what amount of money can be advantageously used for the purpose of coast defense prior to July 1, 1897, and what portion of said amount should be made available during the present fiscal year; also an estimate of what portion of the amount would be required for sites for fortifications, and how much for engineering, and how much for ordnance work, and whether the requisite number of heavy guns can be supplied from the Government shops, and if not, whether the deficiency can be manufactured by private plants in this country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

COINAGE OF SILVER BULLION.

Mr. VEST. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, in pursuance of the existing law vesting in him full power so to do, to coin as rapidly as possible the silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, into standard dollars, and with such dollars to redeem, cancel, and retire the Treasury notes of the United States of July 14, 1890, issued in the purchase of such bullion, and also to redeem the United States notes commonly called "greenbacks" in standard silver dollars as well as in gold, using whichever may be most abundant or convenient.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I should like to inquire what became of the resolution of my colleague?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It went over under objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it objected to?

Mr. PLATT. I objected to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much astonished that such a plain proposition as that was objected to.

PAYMENT OF COIN OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it was the purpose of Congress to keep gold and silver coin at a parity by investing the Secretary of the Treasury with the discretion of paying the coin obligations of the Government as they mature in either metal: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed when liquidating either the interest or principal of the Government's coin obligations to make such payment in gold coin whenever the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold is less than the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, and to continue to pay in such gold coin until the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be equal to the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, but when the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be greater than the market value of 412½ grains of pure silver he shall pay said coin obligations as they mature in silver coin, and continue to pay the same in silver coin until the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver shall be equal to the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLATT. That is too important a resolution to be considered immediately upon its introduction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to its consideration?

Mr. PLATT. There is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALL. If the order of morning business is concluded, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which I offered relating to the appointment of a select committee, and which is now upon the Calendar.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was requested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to state that he is necessarily absent from the Senate to-day, and if the Senator from Florida should desire to call up this resolution to request him to postpone it until his return, which will be on Monday.

Mr. CALL. I desire to have the resolution taken up. I see no reason why it should be delayed on account of the absence of the Senator from New Jersey, whose views are well known upon the subject. He is opposed to the resolution, and has already submitted his observations to the Senate. I should like to have a vote upon my motion.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state for the information of the Senate that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], before leaving yesterday, told me that he had been called away by a matter that was imperative, and he hoped this resolution, in which he takes a great interest and which he opposes, would not be called up during his absence. Under the circumstances, if the Senator from Florida will not on that suggestion defer his motion, I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to inquire whether the motion by which the resolution was committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections has been reconsidered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the pending question, the Chair is advised.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Oregon that when the matter went to the Calendar the pending question was upon my motion to refer the resolution and all the amendments to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. CALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I expect, as a matter of course, to vote for the resolution of the Senator from Florida when we take it up at an opportune time, but in the face of the declaration of a Senator who is absent and feels an interest in the question, I do not think it is right for the Senator from Florida to press it. I hope, therefore, he will let it go over until the Senator from New Jersey returns.

Mr. CALL. I will withdraw the motion, in view of the objection made by Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Florida is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2264) fixing the times for holding the circuit and district courts of the northern district of Iowa and of the southern district of Iowa; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 6,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 2173) making an appropriation for the expenses of a commission to investigate and report on the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-house at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Chair whether that bill is not the unfinished business and if it does not come up regularly at 2 o'clock?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is also the first business on the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. FAULKNER. As the unfinished business it is to come up at a particular hour; and under the rules it can not properly, after having been fixed as the unfinished business, be taken up now. Otherwise it would certainly take Senators by surprise. It can not be laid before the Senate at this time under a proper construction of the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is the unfinished business?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is the unfinished business.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then it does not come up until 2 o'clock.

Mr. FAULKNER. It ought not to be taken up until the hour when the unfinished business is properly in order.

Mr. PEFFER. I think the Senator from West Virginia is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar will be called.

WILLIAM B. MATCHETT.

The bill (S. 480) granting a pension to William B. Matchett was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William B. Matchett, chaplain of the Tenth Regiment of New York Volunteers, at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. PEFFER December 10, 1895, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 480) granting a pension to William B. Matchett, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This case was examined by your committee during the last session of Congress and its passage recommended. The bill passed the Senate, but was not reached in the House of Representatives.

We adopt our former report, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 907, Fifty-third Congress, third session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2696) granting a pension to William B. Matchett, have examined the same, and report:

The petitioner says in his petition that he was enrolled as chaplain of the Tenth Regiment New York Volunteers (McChesney's Zouaves) in April, 1861, after having helped to raise the regiment, and his commission was dated May 15, 1861. That after a time spent at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor, he went with the regiment to Fortress Monroe, Va., and encamped at Hampton on the "Roads" for a few months, and was then ordered to the Fortress, which the regiment garrisoned about eleven months. There being no chaplain at the post, the petitioner occupied the pulpit of the church where the general command attended, first under Gen. B. F. Butler and Colonel Dimick (of the Regular Army), then General Wool, and subsequently under General Mansfield, all now deceased. That while at Camp Hamilton the command was visited by terrific rain and wind storms from Hampton Roads, so that the tents were carried away in the night, the camp flooded with water, and the exposure brought on malarial fever from which he did not recover for several months. The petitioner had a fall, which placed him in the fort hospital, under Surgeon-General Cuyle, for several weeks.

After partial recovery he was called to New York to bury Lieutenant-Colonel Elder, and the funeral occurring in the most inclement weather, he was continually wet to the skin, being on horseback. That with the exposure consequent he was again attacked with malarial fever, followed by chronic diarrhea, and from injuries sustained during the seven days' fight before Richmond and the scant supply of food. He was then taken to General McClellan's headquarters and attended by Surgeon McClelland for several weeks, in June and July, 1862, and by the hospital reports it is clearly shown was treated for chronic diarrhea at Trinity General Hospital, at Washington, D. C., under charge and care of J. W. Hatch, M. D.

Before his entire recovery from this, in April, 1863, and while still suffering from weakness incident to several previous attacks, and while in Washington attending to business in connection with the regiment, the petitioner was arrested illegally, and by some authority not disclosed was immured in the Old Capitol Prison, and could not learn the cause and could not get the charges, and was held there in close confinement for two months, in May and June, 1863, in hot weather, in a small back room with a southern exposure, with guards stationed at the premises with orders to shoot prisoners appearing at the windows, one of whom was shot. He was called in to see the prisoners with a surgeon to counsel the sick and go out to the cemetery to bury the dead as chaplain. Under the strain and anxiety to get at the bottom of the persecution, and prison fare, his system gave way and he became emaciated and demented, and not until General Martindale, whom he had assisted at the battle of Hanover, Va., and Judge A. D. Olin, and Hon. William S. Holman, of Indiana, who demanded his release from the prison, which the War Department granted and sent him to his home, which action he understood was based from evidence of the keeper of the prison, though his own recollection of it is faint, and he did not recognize his own family, and could not walk for weeks.

General Martindale visited his cell and saw for himself and acted. He has not been a well man since, and has not been able to do stated ministerial or pastoral work regularly, nor to resume editorial duties, which he did up to the breaking out of the war, owning and editing the New York (city) Baptist Watchman. He is now unable to perform labor of any kind, and is in very needy circumstances.

He has suffered repeated attacks during these years, which would be brought on by overexertion of body or the brain, and has fallen insensible, and scarcely now recovered from one of those attacks, his life being at times despaired of on account of nervous prostration and partial paralysis. There were two acts of Congress in his behalf, both relating to regulating the time when his service expired.

Your committee also submit copies of the action of the Thirty-eighth Congress, by certain joint resolutions to be found on page 589 of United States Statutes at Large, volume 15, of the first session Thirty-eighth Congress, entitled Joint resolutions Nos. 44 and 52:

"No. 44. Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Paymaster-General of the United States be authorized and directed to adjust and pay to W. B. Matchett the amount due him as chaplain of the Tenth Regiment of New York Volunteers from the time up to which he was last paid to the time said regiment was mustered out of service.

"Approved June 20, 1864.

"No. 52. Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the above-entitled joint resolution shall be construed to adjust and direct the Paymaster-General of the United States to adjust the account of W. B. Matchett, chaplain of the Tenth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay him the amount of the pay and allowances of a chaplain for and during the period that said regiment was in the service of the United States and up to the time the same was mustered out of service, deducting the amount heretofore paid him as such chaplain.

"Approved June 28, 1864."

Your committee having examined carefully all the evidence referred to herein in connection with this case, and which seems to fully justify the basis of this report, which papers are also submitted herewith, recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out the word "twenty," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen."

We again recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if the rate specified in this bill is the usual rate allowed to chaplains?

Mr. PEFFER. So I understand, in such cases.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT OF PENSION MONEY.

The bill (S. 242) to require payment of pension money to wives in cases where male pensioners desert or abandon their families, or are habitual drunkards, or for any reason fail and neglect to support their families, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in all cases where male pensioners desert or abandon their families, or where they are addicted to habitual drunkenness, or where, for any reason or cause, they do not use their pension money for the support of their families and do not support them, and when they have no other sufficient means of support, the Commissioner of Pensions, on such facts being made to appear by competent testimony and on application of the wife of any such pensioner, shall pay the money due him from time to time to his wife so long as such conditions of failure or neglect to support continue.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether this is one of the bills favorably reported by the Committee on Pensions in the last Congress?

Mr. PEFFER. It is; I will say to the Senator it was favorably reported.

Mr. HAWLEY. The committee had agreed to rereport immediately such bills as the Senate passed at the last session, and this passed at the last session.

Mr. PEFFER. The bill passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that there are amendments proposed to this bill according to the report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report refers to the bill of the last session.

Mr. PLATT. But this bill which is reported by the committee needs the amendments which are suggested in the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill, as I understand, is a bill amended in accordance with the report made at the last session.

Mr. PEFFER. And passed the Senate in the form it is now presented. The House of Representatives did not reach it.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps so, but I find on December 10—I may be entirely mistaken about this, but I want to be clear—that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] reported without amendment

Senate bill 242. I find also in the Senate report of last session a letter from Mr. Lochren, the Commissioner of Pensions——

Mr. COCKRELL. Referring to Senate bill 1175.

Mr. PLATT. One moment. Allow me to state, and then the Senator will understand.

The very first suggestion made by the Senate report of last year is that in lines 5 and 6 the words "or where, for any reason or cause, such pensioners" be stricken out, and the word "and" inserted. Those very words which it was proposed should be stricken out are in this bill. The next recommendation of the report was, in line 11, after the word, "pensioner" to insert "she being a woman of good character." Those words are not inserted in this bill. The changes proposed by the report of last year have not been made. If Senators will examine the bill they will see I am correct about it.

Mr. PEFFER. In order that we may understand this fully I suggest that the bill be passed over temporarily without losing its place.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to protest against a provision which would place all the soldiers of the Union Army now receiving pensions under the care or surveillance of anybody. Pensioners may sometimes have unfortunate domestic relations; they may sometimes drink too much; but we do not put men under subjection or surveillance because they drink too much or because they disagree with their wives. This would subject every pensioner on the pension rolls to that kind of surveillance by a civil officer which would be exceedingly offensive. Therefore I shall oppose the bill whenever it comes up.

Mr. PEFFER. Let it be temporarily passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

ANNIE M. GREENE.

The bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Annie M. Greene, dependent and invalid daughter of Jeremiah Greene, late a private in Company A, First Regiment New Hampshire Artillery Volunteers, at $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. OSGOOD.

The bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of James H. Osgood, late a seaman on the U. S. S. Circassian, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA A. HILL.

The bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Julia A. Hill, widow of Charles W. Hill, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. Is the message of the President of the United States which was received last evening still on the table?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on the table. No disposition has been made of it.

Mr. STEWART. Is it in order to make comments upon it at this time?

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Nevada. We have come so near to doing some real good here this morning that I wish he would wait for fifteen or twenty minutes. The two last pension bills on the Calendar I am especially interested in.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield for the consideration of pension bills, and then I shall take the floor.

SAMUEL GOLDWATER.

The bill (S. 404) granting a pension to Samuel Goldwater was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at $15 per month, the name of Samuel Goldwater, late of Company A, First Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, National Guard.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESOLUTIONS AND BILL PASSED OVER.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that the next three items of business on the Calendar be passed over without prejudice to their position, as they will inevitably involve debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The resolutions and bill referred to are as follows:

A resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART, December 12, 1895, that the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire what effect the difference of exchange between gold-standard countries and silver-standard countries has upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the United States, etc.;

A resolution submitted by Mr. CALL, December 17, 1895, providing for the investigation of organized efforts of corporations to control the election of members of Congress; and

A bill (S. 238) to prohibit officers of the Government from refusing to pay moneys appropriated by act of Congress.

MARY A. HALL.

The bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary A. Hall, widow of Charles J. Hall, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, and to allow her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHERINE R. JARDINE.

The bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was there not an amendment reported to that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was an amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions, which will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 7, after the words "rate of," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Edward Jardine, late brigadier-general of the Army of the United States, and pay her at the rate of $50 a month.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was very sorry to have such an amendment made to a bill to pension the widow of General Jardine by the Committee on Pensions at the last session. I preferred to have it stay at $100 a month, but it was put down to $50 because that was supposed to be the most we could get from the then existing House of Representatives. We think we might get a little more from the present House.

The history of this case is extraordinary, and I shall not undertake to give it here. It is all shown in the report upon the bill. General Jardine was one of the officers who jumped in in an emergency to the help of the United States troops against that fearful mob at the time of the draft riots in New York City in 1863. In the course of his very brilliant and daring behavior on that occasion he was wounded by a slug made from a piece of gas pipe, fired from a musket, the charge going through his knee and thigh. The good woman referred to here was his tender nurse for many years, and it is a wonder that her prolonged and faithful ministrations did not kill her also. General Jardine was kept in an office in the New York custom-house, I am proud to say, though he was not able to do a full day's work always, and sometimes had to lie abed for a whole week in agony. I want his widow to have $100 a month, and as the bill stands at $50 I move to strike out "fifty" and put in "one hundred," as we originally intended.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator. I think the members of the Committee on Pensions will agree with me that nearly every widow of a brigadier-general has been pensioned at $50 a month, and if the pension in this case is raised to $100 a month it will mean that they must all be raised. I think it had better stand at the amount which has been agreed upon as the amount that will be given the widows of brigadier-generals. It is very hard, it is very difficult and ungrateful to make discriminations and distinctions, and give one widow $100 a month and another $50 a month. I know of two or three cases from Missouri where I shall have to insist, if this increase is made, that the same increase shall be made, and they are cases where $100 was the amount originally proposed by the Committee on Pensions. If I am not mistaken, the rule of the Committee on Pensions has been for years past to allow only $50 a month.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the amendment reported by the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To strike out "$100" and insert "$50."

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought that change had been made. Therefore I moved to make it "$100." I have no objection to an increase to $100 in any case that approaches this in merit, any case of such extraordinary injuries and such prolongation of agony from the middle of the war until a year or so ago. If any other widow of a brigadier-general or a colonel——

Mr. COCKRELL. This is not to pay General Jardine for the physical sufferings that he endured.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know that.

Mr. COCKRELL. But it is to pay the widow of a brigadier-general. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is to pay the widow of Ed. Jardine $100 a month; I do not care what his rank was for this purpose, but he was a brigadier. I oppose my own committee's amendment, but am willing to take $50 a month if we can not get $100.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. CULLOM. On the 3d day of December I introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 12) to enforce the Monroe doctrine, and I at that time asked that it be laid upon the table to enable the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] to make remarks upon it, as he indicated his intention to do. I believe he is now determined not to speak upon the joint resolution, and even if he wished to do so the subject has passed out of the Senate for the time being. I therefore move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COURTS IN IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill from the other House relating to Iowa courts may be laid before the Senate at this time.

The bill (H. R. 2264) fixing the times for holding the circuit court and district courts of the northern district of Iowa and of the southern district of Iowa was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a bill which relates wholly to fixing the dates for holding the several courts in Iowa. I called the attention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to its provisions, and for reasons which he stated to me it is not practicable to have a meeting of the committee within the next few days, and yet it is important that this bill shall pass before the 1st of January. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEAR. I introduced yesterday a similar bill, identical in its terms with the bill which has just been passed. I suggest that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the committee will be discharged from the consideration of Senate bill 1110, and it will be postponed indefinitely.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, yesterday the President's patriotic course was commended and indorsed not only by the two Houses of Congress, but by the American people. The loyal people of the United States were resolved and are resolved to stand by the President in his patriotic vindication of the Monroe doctrine, in which is involved the safety of the Republic.

I regret, and I suppose all patriotic citizens must regret, that the President, immediately after that grand indorsement, placed himself on a lower level. Why this was done is not explained by words in the message which he sent to Congress, but it is coincident with proceedings on the other side of the Atlantic which were of such a threatening character that they appear to have diverted him from his grand purpose. The meeting in banking houses, the financial war made upon American securities, the threat to destroy American credit, reached to the White House, and the President has yielded before it.

What does he command us to do? To carry out the recommendations of his annual message. What are those recommendations? Five hundred million dollars of gold bonds and five hundred million dollars less money with which to pay them by the destruction of the greenbacks.

He says:

If, in this particular instance, our predicament is at all influenced by a recent insistence upon the position we should occupy in our relation to certain questions concerning our foreign policy, this furnishes a signal and impressive warning that even the patriotic sentiment of our people is not an adequate substitute for a sound financial policy.

Of course there can be no doubt in any thoughtful mind as to the complete solvency of our nation, nor can there be any just apprehension that the American people will be satisfied with less than an honest payment of our public obligations in the recognized money of the world.

What is the recognized money of the world? There is no recognized money of the world. The world does not issue money. The only recognized money is the money of nations, and the money of one nation is not money in another. The recognized money of the world is a myth! Our duty is to pay our obligations according to contract. Our highest duty is to pay our obligations in the recognized money of the law and the contract. But the suggestion that we now destroy greenbacks and issue gold bonds comes too late. It is obsolete.

If the President means what he says in his patriotic message to Congress, he means that if the demands of the United States are resisted specie payment will be suspended and that the United States will exercise its inherent constitutional right and power to clothe any material that may be necessary with the monopoly of paying debts and taxes, and with that kind of money to defy the world. It should be remembered that no great war has ever been fought with gold; that gold is a coward. The suggestion, while these difficulties are pending, that we will rely on England to borrow her gold in order to vindicate the Monroe doctrine is absurd. It can not be done. We need go no further back than modern history to show that our national existence and our national safety depend upon the power to create money and not to borrow it.

What would have become of Great Britain in the time of the Napoleonic wars if she had not exercised the power to make the Bank of England notes legal tender for twenty-two years and suspended specie payment, during which time she prospered more than in any other period in her history? What would have become of us in the Revolution if we had relied on borrowing money of England or anybody else; if we had talked about the world's money? What would have happened to us in the war of the sections if we could not have issued the greenback? It is true that the greenback was dishonored by us in part, because it was not receivable for all debts, for all Government dues. But in case England will not comply with our demand, the United States has no resource to defend itself except by the exercise of the sovereign power to issue money and to clothe it with the functions of paying debts and taxes.

The experiment has been tried too frequently to doubt its efficacy. There never was a time from 1803 to 1861 when there was not paper out, either of the Government or United States bank notes, which was received for all Government dues, and in no instance was that paper below par. Greenbacks did not go below par until they were crippled and degraded by refusing to receive them for Government dues. We have an example now. The best money we have in circulation is the silver certificate, redeemable in silver dollars, and the silver in a silver dollar is worth only 50 cents. Nobody asks the redemption of these certificates. They have the function of paying debts and taxes, and therefore they are good money, the best money. If the President attempts to resist English aggressions with English money he will fail. It is our duty to stand by the President, to uphold his hands, and point him to the American people for assistance. He should withdraw his attention from the other side of the Atlantic.

We knew very well that if the United States attempted to assert her rights as against England, British financiers would make financial war. We expected it; it has come. The President should not yield to it. We must hold up his hands in this emergency and get him to understand that there is power enough in 70,000,000 people and resources enough in this country to cope with all the world, and that we have also the power, which has been frequently exercised and should always be exercised in great emergencies, to create money good at home. There is nothing necessary in the way of materials of war that can not be created here and paid for with American money. If that be not so, we are already whipped; but it is so. I tell you that the American people are behind the President in his patriotic declaration that America will no longer submit to insult or aggression from any foreign power, particularly Great Britain. He has the American people behind him. Why should he fear a bombardment from Wall street? Why should he call upon us to rescue him from that enemy? We knew that that enemy would attack him. We expected it. The last clause of his message indicates that he is panic-stricken, so to speak. Just listen to what he says. He needs support; he needs the assistance of a brave Congress. Here is the language of his message:

I ask at the hands of the Congress such prompt aid as it alone has the power to give to prevent, in a time of fear and apprehension, any sacrifice of the people's interests and the public funds or the impairment of our public credit in an effort by Executive action to relieve the dangers of the present emergency.

He tells us that his apprehensions are such that he wants Congress to come to the rescue, lest, by Executive action, he should increase the dangers in the present emergency. What does he contemplate? I hope and I believe that he does not contemplate a submission to the demands of Great Britain. I hope he does not contemplate a submission to the demands of Wall street or Lombard street. I hope he does not contemplate another bond issue to placate the enemies of this country. I hope the fears which he says he has are not such as to prevent him from executing the law. It is plain. All he has to do in order to save the credit of the country is to pay the Government obligations according to contract. If he has not gold, the law says he may pay silver. Let him announce that he will do that, and there will be no more raids on the Treasury. We owe no gold obligation. Every obligation of this Government is payable in silver, except the gold certificates, and there is enough gold in the Treasury to meet them. There need be no apprehension.

I hope the President does not distrust himself and fear that he will plunge the country into greater distress by reason of the action of the money powers. It is true that they have praised him because he was their friend, but they have deserted him now because he has become the friend of the American people. He must have known that if he chose to be the friend of the American people and to declare in favor of defending American rights, those men were the enemies of this country and would make war upon us. Let them go on with their financial war. We can meet it now better than at any other time. We have a just cause and a brave declaration by the President. I am glad that Congress is not going to adjourn and that it will stay here to sustain the President in his Venezuelan message, and tell him that he need not fear. The American people are behind him; Congress is behind him, and let the Wall street speculators and gold gamblers do their worst. They will do it anyhow. Let them know that the Government of the United States is in favor of the people of the United States and is not for the gold gamblers of Europe. When that declaration is made the President will be out of danger. He is now out of danger of flattery from the crowned heads of Europe, which has been his besetting danger ever since he has been President. Since he is out of danger of flattery, let us put him out of danger of threats. They can not hurt him as long as he stands and acts for the American people as he did in his bold declaration of principles which was discussed yesterday.

The President knew when he made his bold assertion in favor of the rights of the American people against British aggressions that he was burning every bridge between him and the money powers—that loyalty to 70,000,000 people would be regarded as treason in Wall and Lombard streets. He could not if he would desert the people and join the bondholders, money changers, and gold gamblers of New York and London. Such a desertion would expose him to the scorn and indignation of an outraged people. Hereafter, whatever may occur, the space between him and the enemies of the Republic is illumined by the calcium light of his patriotic message, and any attempt on his part to retreat or desert will be seen by all. It can not be concealed. He can not hereafter cooperate with gold gamblers without having it known of all men, and nobody believes that the President is bold enough, if such was his purpose (which God forbid), to desert the American people in this crisis and take refuge in Rothschild's army of avarice.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I regret very much that the President has seen fit to send his last financial message to Congress at this time. He must know, as the country does, that Congress is not going to retire the greenbacks, nor are they going to give him authority to issue gold bonds.

I see in the New York Sun of this morning the statement of ex-Governor Flower, in which he says:

> Congress will, in my opinion, pass a resolution in accordance with President Cleveland's request, and, if necessary, give him authority to issue $500,000,000 in short-time bonds.

President Cleveland must know, and Congress certainly does, that no such authority will be given him, and at this crisis all that the President accomplishes is suddenly to precipitate upon the country a tariff discussion. If anything at all is accomplished by Congress it will be a revision of the tariff on Republican lines, and this the President will veto. Nobody that I know of wants to issue bonds. Nobody to speak of wishes to retire the greenbacks, and it seems to me that it is extremely unfortunate that the President has precipitated this discussion at the present time. He might have put it off, or he should have recommended something that there was some hope of passing.

The Senate, if they are allowed to vote on it, will pass as soon as they can get to it on the next legislative day the resolution submitted this morning by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], declaring that outstanding paper obligations shall be paid in silver as the law directs. The country might just as well understand that. We understand it here. Yet the supporters of the President in this Chamber will probably not let us vote on that proposition. They surely will not until after considerable debate and the consumption of much time. It is utterly, absolutely impossible to legislate financially in accordance with the recommendations of the President, because the Congress is not in favor of it, and no one knows it better than the President. The sooner the people clearly and distinctly understand it the better, it seems to me, it will be for the country.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 24, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 23, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION, ETC.

Under Rule XXIV, clause 2, the following executive communication, etc., were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

Letters from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of the findings filed by the court in the following-named cases; which were referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed:

Henry Field against The United States.

William McDaniel against The United States.

C. E. Hall, administrator, against The United States.

Lamoureux N. Kennedy, administrator, against The United States.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report on the auditing and adjusting of the claim of the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works for damages and losses incurred in the construction of the armored battle ship Texas, accompanied by certain reports, etc., relating to the case; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A concurrent resolution relative to printing extra copies of Senate Document No. 226, first session Fiftieth Congress, relating to the Venezuela boundary; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MORSE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHUFORD, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. CULP, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. WASHINGTON, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SORG, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOCKERY, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

DUTIES ON WOOL, COTTON, ETC.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a bill to levy and collect duties on wool, hair, sheep, and cotton. This is substantially the bill of the National Wool Growers' Association. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. This bill will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; but the Chair understands that under the rules of the House these bills should ordinarily be handed to the Speaker's clerk.

The bill (H. R. 2623) was read twice, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

Mr. DANIELS. I have a resolution which I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That each Committee on Elections shall be authorized to appoint a clerk; also, that each of said committees be authorized and allowed to sit during the sessions of the House; also, that the chairmen of such committees shall have power to divide the contested-election contests as nearly as may be between the several committees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CRISP. There is no objection to its consideration, but I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Does he not think that in the distribution of cases among these several committees some of the minority members ought to be consulted. The ordinary method has been, there having been only one committee, for the Speaker to refer these cases to the Committee on Elections. But now we have three divisions of the committee; and it is proposed that the assignment of the cases shall be determined by the chairmen of the respective committees. I ask again, does it not occur to the gentleman from New York that some member of the minority of the committee, as well as a member of the majority, should have some voice in determining the reference?

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this is not like a case where you make the reference, because you do not pass upon the case at all. After referring a case to a committee you have no voice in deciding it. But this proposition is to let three members of the majority who are to decide the cases determine which cases each division of the committee shall take—how the cases shall be distributed up among the different branches of the committee. Now, if the distribution is to be made by the committee or any member of it, ought not some one of the minority to be consulted or have some voice in the matter?

This is a question of considerable substance. I will say with the utmost frankness that one of the contestees—it is not necessary to mention his name in public—objects to having his case come before that committee of which a certain gentleman is chairman. For the reason that he has had in the Committee on Elections heretofore a personal controversy with that gentleman, and that he has been assailed on the floor of the House by that gentleman, he does not believe that if his case should go before the section presided over by that gentleman he will have justice accorded to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest that in justice to the members of the committee the name of that member should be stated.

Mr. DANIELS. I will say in answer——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that if there is objection to this part of the proposition of the gentleman from New York, the matter be left where it is by the rules, under which, as the Chair understands (subject to correction), the Speaker would make the selection.

Mr. CRISP. Undoubtedly that is where the selection rests under the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think that would be, by all odds, the best plan. I want to say——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, then, to that modification, the question is on the remainder of the resolution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that this modification eliminates the provision that the chairmen of these committees designate to what division or branch certain cases shall go.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BAILEY. My understanding is that without any action by the House, the Speaker having referred certain cases to the committee, the chairman of that committee always refers those cases, as his judgment may direct, to the various subcommittees. Will the resolution of the gentleman from New York vary the present practice?

Mr. DANIELS. There is no objection to leaving out the clause referred to.

Mr. BAILEY. I was trying to ascertain if it would alter the present rule. The Speaker, under the rule as it now stands, would refer these cases to these respective committees as his judgment might dictate, and when the cases have been thus referred the chairman of each committee would subdivide the work, and allot to each of the subcommittees the cases of which it should take charge. That is the present practice, I believe.

Mr. DANIELS. Let that part of the resolution be struck out, and let the rest be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, before that, if he intends that each of these clerks shall be a per diem clerk, receiving the salary of $6 per day, or is it proposed to make the appointment an annual one?

Mr. DANIELS. I understand from the gentleman from Indiana that these would be per diem clerks, under the practice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, would be a matter to be determined hereafter. This resolution simply authorizes the appointment of the clerks, and the question of their compensation would be a question for consideration at some future time, and not necessarily now.

Mr. DINGLEY. It might be better to determine it now. If it be desired to have per diem clerks, you can insert in the resolution such language as will accomplish that purpose and provide for their pay.

Mr. BINGHAM. It would have to come up in the nature of a deficiency anyway.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, on the deficiency bill. Well, the committee can determine that hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is already provision for one clerk for the Committee on Elections. This resolution, the Chair understands, would be a substitute for that.

Mr. DANIELS. That is the idea.

The resolution was adopted.

REFERENCE OF ELECTION CASES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer the first nine of the contested-election cases to the first branch of the Committee on Elections; the next eleven to the second committee, and the remainder to the third. In dividing the cases in this way the Chair is governed simply by a desire that the cases from each State shall go to the same committee, inasmuch as the members of such committee would naturally familiarize themselves with the State law.

Mr. CRISP. What does the Chair mean by the "first nine?"

The SPEAKER. That is as the Clerk has designated them. The Chair does not know on what basis the Clerk made that arrangement, but takes it precisely as made up by the Clerk, since it covers the question of the distribution of the cases by States.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if the reference, as indicated by the Chair, is designed to take them as they appear in the RECORD of the first day's proceedings?

The SPEAKER. So the Chair intended.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time for consideration a resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts is hereby authorized and directed to designate the committees of the House to which the clerks provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, should be allowed and assigned for the present Congress, and report by resolution to the House for its action thereon.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, before the question is submitted, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if this resolution is intended to indorse the action of the House taken at the last session of Congress? In other words, when the appropriation bill passed to which reference is made in the resolution there were a certain number of annual clerks taken off, a certain number of committees were deprived of the use of clerks, and certain other committees had clerks assigned to them. Does this allow that arrangement to stand, or does it propose to revise the whole committee list?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not so understand the resolution. It is customary at the beginning of each Congress to introduce a resolution of this character, have it referred to the Committee on Accounts, and let that committee determine which of the various committees of the House are entitled to per diem clerks, or session clerks, as the case may be, under the appropriation bill referred to in the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. The per diem clerks are appropriated for, I understand, in the aggregate, a lump sum being given for that purpose. The annual clerks are specifically provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand that this has anything to do with the annual clerks.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I have no objection to it.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement which will be of interest to the members of the House. The concurrent resolution for the holiday recess, which passed the House some time ago, and which was sent to the Senate and returned with an amendment, and then referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, has been considered by that committee, and in view of the message which the President has addressed to the two Houses, and in view of other circumstances, the committee have unanimously determined that it is not appropriate at present that the two Houses of Congress should adjourn until they shall have considered the questions which have been brought to the attention of Congress by the President. In view of the urgency which has been presented, the committee are already entering upon the preparation of a bill or bills to provide a remedy for the situation which has been indicated; and while I am not able at this moment to say at what time the committee will be prepared to report, yet I am prepared to say that the committee will be prepared to report as soon as members who are absent on the supposition that we were to have the usual holiday recess shall have had an opportunity to return, and they hope to be able to present matters for the consideration of the House at the opening of the session on Thursday next. I will say, in justice to members who are absent under the expectation of the holiday recess, that it is appropriate that we should wait until they can have an opportunity to return. Members having this information before them who are being telegraphed to by absent members will see from this that it is exceedingly desirable that all the members of the House should be present in the House at the opening of the session on Thursday next.

I shall ask the House to have a session to-morrow, simply for the purpose of distributing the President's message, when probably an adjournment will be taken until Thursday morning. We hope on Thursday morning to proceed to make some response to the urgent request which the President has made upon Congress to take some action with reference to the condition in which the country now finds itself. This is all I think I desire to say. [Applause.]

LEASE OF PREMISES FOR USE OF FOLDING ROOM.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Accounts desire to submit a report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, directed to continue for the use of the folding room of the House the lease of the brick stable owned by the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, the rent, $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House from and after January 1, 1896, and until other provision is made therefor.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, directing the Doorkeeper of the House to continue for the use of the folding room of the House the lease of the brick stable owned by the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, the rent, $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House from and after January 1, 1896, and until other provision is made therefor, beg to report that after due investigation they respectfully recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say in connection with that report that the old lease of these premises will expire on the 1st of the coming month, and that the committee have not been able to find space elsewhere to accommodate the large number of publications which are stored in that building. At present there are 400,000 volumes of new matter in that building. There is no room in this building for them. The lease is a low one——

Mr. McMILLIN. We are unable to hear the statement of the gentleman, by reason of the confusion in the House.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will please take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Now, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will repeat that the lease of these premises will expire on the 1st of the coming month, and that no other space has been found which could be substituted for that purpose. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the report, believing that the rent is low and that the room is absolutely necessary for the transaction of the business of the folding room.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is being used for the storage of documents now, I believe, is it not?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; it is.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Before the gentleman sits down, I wish to suggest to him that if I read the newspapers aright the name of that company has been changed to the Capital Traction Company, so that if this resolution is passed with the name of the old company in it it might be void.

Mr. ALDRICH. The point may be a good one, Mr. Speaker; I have no objection to amending the report to conform to the new title of the company.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made, without objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It can be made by inserting the words "or its successors."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will add the words "or its successors," in the absence of objection.

There was no objection.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COLSON, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COX, for ten days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 24, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 20th instant, a statement showing during each of the last five years and for the whole period the gross amount of the imports from ports of Great Britain and her colonies and dependencies, together with the amount of the exports to such ports; also the number of entries of British vessels into American ports and their gross tonnage; which, with the accompanying statement, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting the report of the operations of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, together with a statement of disbursements from the appropriation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which, together with the accompanying statement, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 20th instant, a report respecting an agreement of common carriers of interstate traffic between the Western States and the Atlantic Seaboard to form a joint traffic association; which was read.

Mr. PEFFER. I rose to ask that the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission be read, but I observe that it is longer than I thought it was. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF SEED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant, a statement of expenditures from the appropriation for the "purchase and distribution of valuable seeds," made by the act approved March 2, 1895, and a copy of each "bid or offer made to the said Department to furnish it with seeds, bulbs, cuttings, etc.," in response to its advertisement dated April 27, 1895, or otherwise submitted for its consideration, etc.; which, with the accompanying statement, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CLAIM OF RICHMOND LOCOMOTIVE AND MACHINE WORKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, pursuant to the authorization contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, a report as to the claim of the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works against the Government for damages and losses sustained by that company; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS REPORT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the claim of A. P. H. Stewart and Charles A. Weed, formerly partners under the firm name of Stewart & Co., vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against hasty action in regard to the Venezuelan question, and praying for arbitration and a peaceful settlement of all international controversies; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Aberdeen, the Board of Trade of the city of Hoquiam, the Business Men's Club of the city of Montesano, the Board of Trade of the city of Cosmopolis, the Merchants' Club of the city of Elma, and the Commercial Club of the city of Ocosta, all of Chehalis County, southwestern Washington, urging the need of improvement at the entrance of Grays Harbor. The memorialists call attention to the facts respecting the tributary country, the present industries, the commerce, and benefits to shipping; also to the great increase in the wealth of the nation that will result from such improvement, and from the harbor of refuge that will be created in the North Pacific Ocean. I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the action of the President in regard to Venezuela; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Bushnell Club of Logan, Ohio, indorsing the action of Congress as to Venezuela and expressing sympathy with Cuba and Hawaii; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Joe Hooker Post, No. 21, Grand Army of the Republic, of Mount Vernon, Ohio, praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the petition of Rufus L. B. Clarke, a citizen of the United States, praying for the reception and reference to the proper committee for consideration and report of the protest presented by him against his removal as examiner in chief in the Patent Office. I move that the petition, with the accompanying brief, be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Newark, N. J., praying that belligerent rights be granted to the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VEST presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRICE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, expressing to Congress and the President its hearty approval of the steps they are taking to preserve the national dignity and honor in connection with the question of the Venezuelan boundary lines; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Lodge No. 103, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Elyria, Ohio, praying that an appropriation be made to reimburse the Odd Fellows' Hall Association for destruction or loss of personal property at New Orleans, La., during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present house joint memorial No. 2, adopted at the eighteenth regular biennial session of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, praying for the early construction and control of the Nicaragua Canal by the Government. I ask that the memorial be read and that it lie on the table for the present.

The memorial was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[House joint memorial No. 2.]

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the Pacific Coast, and particularly the State of Oregon, would be greatly benefited by the opening up, at the earliest possible date, of the Nicaragua Canal; and

Whereas the people of the United States, and especially of the coast, have shown much interest in the project, realizing the great benefits to be derived therefrom by shortening the route by sea from coast to coast: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, That by the showing made in the above-recited facts, such project should be under the control of the United States of America, and we therefore recommend that the same be constructed by this Government to be operated and owned exclusively by it.

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, as soon as adopted, be presented to our Senator, who is now in Salem, and one each to our Senator and Representatives in Washington.

Adopted by the house January 30, 1895.

CHAS. B. MOORES,
Speaker of the House.

Concurred in by the senate February 12, 1895.

JOSEPH SIMON,
President of the Senate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Oregon:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Salem, Oreg., December 16, 1895.

I, H. R. Kincaid, do hereby certify that I am the secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State; that the foregoing transcript of house joint memorial No. 2, adopted at the eighteenth regular biennial session of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, has been by me compared with the original copy of the said house joint memorial No. 2, now on file in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript thereof, and the whole of said original house joint memorial No. 2.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 16th day of December, A. D. 1895.

H. R. KINCAID,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of the legislature of Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation reimbursing volunteers who were called to assist the regular soldiers of the United States in the years 1855–56, when war was made upon the white settlers of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, and known locally as the Yakima and Rogue River wars, respectively; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

[House joint memorial No. 6.]

By the house of representatives of the legislative assembly of Oregon, the senate concurring.

To the Congress of the United States:

We, your memorialists, respectfully represent that during the years 1855 and 1856 war was made upon the white settlers of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, which, though known locally as the Yakima and Rogue River wars, respectively, was in fact a collusive effort on the part of the native race to exterminate the American settlers of the North Pacific Coast, during which volunteers were called out to assist the regular soldiers of the United States, and men and property were furnished by the settlers of Oregon and Washington (as found by a commission appointed by act of Thirty-fourth Congress, chapter 129, section 11) to the aggregate amount of $6,011,459.36.

That this sum, found due by the commission, consisting of Gen. Rufus Ingalls, United States Army, Capt. A. J. Smith, United States Army, and L. F. Grover, since governor of Oregon and United States Senator, was scaled down arbitrarily and unjustly by the Third Auditor of the United States Treasury the full difference between the prices of labor and property on the Pacific and Atlantic sides of the continent at that time to the scales of the latter, thus withholding the sum of $3,296,643.81 lawfully and justly due the people of Oregon and Washington for the services rendered and property furnished.

The following is section 4 of an act passed by the Oregon Territorial legislature at its session of 1855-56, fixing the rate of pay for the volunteers called for, showing the local valuation of the service and property:

"SEC. 4. Whenever such volunteers are called and received into the service of the Territory by virtue of this act, each noncommissioned officer and private shall be entitled to receive $2 per day and rations, and $2 per day for the use and risk of his horse and equipments, except for horses actually killed in action, unavoidably lost, or reported unfit for service and turned over to the quartermaster, in which case the owner shall receive the appraised value thereof. And all commissioned officers shall receive the same pay as officers of the same rank in the Army of the United States: Provided, That commissioned officers shall receive the same pay for use and risk of horses as noncommissioned officers."

The act of which the above is an extract, contained an emergency clause, and the men who responded to the call were mainly of the patriotic frontier class, to whom the wealth winners of the nation are much indebted. They are now nearing the end of life and only ask at your hands what was found to be justly due and arbitrarily and unjustly withheld.

The men thus served are many of them old and needy and can therefore add necessity to their plea for justice. Moreover, they do not understand why, as soldiers, they are not as well entitled to pensions and land warrants for services rendered and risks incurred as any other soldier of the Republic.

We would also submit that the soldiers who served in the Cayuse war of 1847 and 1848 under the provisional government of Oregon should receive pension on the same basis as the soldiers of the Mexican war.

In the preparation of a bill in accordance with the prayer of this memorial our delegation in Congress is respectively to make provision for the payment of any sum of money that may be awarded by this act direct to each individual for whom it is intended by the issuance in each case of a Treasury warrant payable to the order to each person above named or their assigns, said warrants to be forwarded to the treasurer of the State of Oregon, to be handed to such persons upon satisfactory proof that he or she is the person for whom the said warrant is intended.

Whereas the subject of the foregoing claim is preferred by men widely scattered and are therefore unable to present their claims as individuals in the Court of Claims: Therefore,

Resolved, That our representatives in Congress be forwarded each a copy of this memorial and ask their earnest service in securing the justice herein prayed for.

Adopted by the house January 30, 1895.

CHAS. B. MOORES,
Speaker of the House.

Concurred in by the senate January 31, 1895.

JOSEPH SIMON,
President of the Senate.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Oregon:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Salem, Oreg., December 16, 1895.

I, H. R. Kincaid, do hereby certify that I am the secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State; that the foregoing transcript of house joint memorial No. 6, adopted at the eighteenth regular biennial session of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, has been by me compared with the original copy of the said house joint memorial No. 6, now on file in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript thereof, and the whole of said original house joint memorial No. 6.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 16th day of December, A. D. 1895.

H. R. KINCAID,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a memorial of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, urging the Congress of the United States to place purchasers of even sections within the limits of forfeited railroad land grants upon an equality with other purchasers of such lands within the limits of said grants. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Oregon if it would not be quite satisfactory to him to allow the memorial to be printed in the RECORD, instead of taking the time to read it?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly; I am entirely satisfied with that course.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, hereby respectfully represent:

Whereas the even sections of public lands within the limits of the Congressional land grants in aid of the construction of railroads were sold by the Government at $2.50 an acre on account of the supposed increase of their value which would be caused by the construction of the roads in aid of which the grants were made; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has forfeited all of the unearned portions of railroad land grants, has fixed the price of the forfeited odd sections at $1.25 an acre, and has reduced the price of the even sections within said grants to $1.25 an acre, and the consideration to purchasers of said even sections for the increase of their price paid by them has failed; and

Whereas simple justice demands that the Government should refund to purchasers of the even sections within the limits of all forfeited land grants who have paid the maximum price of $2.50 an acre $1.25 an acre of such purchase price: Therefore,

Resolved, That your memorialists urge the Congress of the United States to place said purchasers of even sections within the limits of forfeited railroad land grants upon an equality with other purchasers of lands within the limits of said grants and to pass the Dolph bill, which has been favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Public Lands and is now upon the Calendar of the Senate, providing for the repayment to such purchasers of even sections of $1.25 an acre.

Passed by the senate February 2, 1895.

JOSEPH SIMON,
President of the Senate.

Passed by the house February 4, 1895.

CHAS. B. MOORES,
Speaker of the House.

I, H. R. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 16th day of December, A. D. 1895.

H. R. KINCAID,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a memorial of the legislature of Oregon, urging the enactment of legislation granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret C. McKay, widow of the late Dr. William C. McKay, of Portland, Oreg.; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to the Congress of the United States praying for the passage of an act of Congress granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret C. McKay, widow of the late Dr. William C. McKay, of Pendleton, Oreg.:

Whereas Dr. William C. McKay, late of Pendleton, Oreg., was in 1851 instrumental in securing the surrender of the Indian murderers of Dr. Whitman; and

Whereas at the trial of said murderers at Oregon City the Indian chiefs present incited Dr. McKay to establish a trading post in their country, which he did, near the site of the present city of Pendleton, Oregon, and said post became a rendezvous of traders and travelers and was a powerful factor in restraining the restless tribes of the Northwest; and

Whereas in June, 1855, Dr. McKay was secretary in behalf of the United States at the great Wallawalla Council called by Gen. I. I. Stevens, Gen. Joe Palmer, and others, and was instrumental in securing a cession of Indian lands; and

Whereas in the autumn of 1855 the sudden influx of whites into the Indian country brought on a war, in which the Indians singled out Dr. McKay as a fitting object for their revenge and totally destroyed his post and property; and

Whereas Dr. McKay was a prominent scout in the war of 1855-56 and his services were of extraordinary value to the commanding generals, who were unacquainted with Indian methods of warfare; and

Whereas in the fall of 1856 Dr. McKay acted as a guide for the expeditions of Generals Wright and Steptoe, and it was at his suggestion that the site for Fort Wallawalla was selected and a garrison established there; and

Whereas in 1866 the Snakes began to commit depredations, massacreing settlers and cutting off supply trains, and by act of the Oregon legislature Dr. McKay was asked to organize a company of Warm Spring Indian scouts to take the field against the hostile Snakes, which he did, and the Doctor and his company were sworn into the United States service in October, 1866, entering the field in midwinter. In one year's time the Snakes and Pi-Utes sued for peace, openly attributing their defeat to McKay and his scouts. The amount of life and property saved to the whites by the Doctor's heroism in this hazardous campaign is beyond estimate; and

Whereas the Doctor did during his lifetime try to secure compensation for his losses, but unsuccessfully; and

Whereas though of mixed blood, he was always a friend and helper to the whites; and

Whereas Margaret C. McKay, the widow of said William C. McKay, is a cripple in old age and straitened circumstances;

Wherefore, in view of these many and valuable services to early Oregon, Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Oregon (the house of representatives concurring), That our Representatives and Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to exert their influence to secure the passage by Congress of an act granting a suitable and adequate pension to said Margaret C. McKay, widow of said William C. McKay.

Adopted by the senate January 29, 1895.

JOSEPH SIMON,
President of the Senate.

Speaker of the House.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Salem, Oreg., December 16, 1895.

I, H. R. Kincaid, do hereby certify that I am the secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State; that the foregoing transcript of senate joint memorial No. 2 adopted at the eighteenth regular biennial session of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon has been by me compared with the original copy of the said senate joint memorial No. 2 now on file in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript thereof, and the whole of said original senate joint memorial No. 2.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 16th day of December, A. D. 1895.

H. R. KINCAID,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a memorial of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, praying that Congress reimburse the Port of Portland in the full sum or the amount expended by that port in making certain improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate joint memorial No. 1.]

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas by an act of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, filed in the office of the secretary of state February 16, 1891, a corporation known as the Port of Portland was created embracing within its limits certain portions of Multnomah County; and

Whereas the object of the creation of said corporation was to improve the Willamette River at the cities of Portland, East Portland, and Albina (now consolidated and embraced within the city of Portland, Multnomah County, Oreg.) and the Willamette and Columbia rivers between said cities and the sea, so that there should be made and permanently maintained in said Willamette and Columbia rivers from said cities to the sea a ship channel of good and sufficient depth at all points at mean low water; and

Whereas said act incorporating said Port of Portland provides for the issuance of $500,000 in bonds or notes for a certain term of years, said bonds to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually all in United States gold coin; and

Whereas said act gives said corporation the authority to assess and collect taxes on all property within its boundaries which is by law taxable for State and county purposes at a certain specified rate sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds and to provide a sinking fund for the redemption of the same; and

Whereas the said corporation so created was organized and commissioners appointed to exercise the powers conferred upon it; and

Whereas since the creation and organization of said Port of Portland the said corporation has realized $310,000 from the sale of the bonds authorized by said act, which said money has been expended in the improvement of the said Willamette and Columbia rivers under the supervision of the officers of the United States Government and which said sum the said Port of Portland commission is now obligated to pay, and

Whereas $37,729.77 has been paid by said Port of Portland in interest on said bonds; and

Whereas the said sum, to wit, $310,000, has been expended in the improvement of said rivers by dredging and constructing permanent dikes beyond the limits of the said district embraced within the limits of said corporation; and

Whereas the remaining portion of said money has been expended in the necessary improvement of said rivers and the harbors thereof; and

Whereas the money so expended by said corporation inures to the benefit of the State of Oregon and the country at large and the improvements accomplished thereby are of a nature generally and properly undertaken by the General Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, That Congress be requested to reimburse the Port of Portland in the full sum of the amount expended by said Port of Portland in making the improvements aforesaid, and in paying interest on the bonds heretofore issued for such purpose, and that provision be made by the General Government for the payment of the interest yet to accrue on said bonds now outstanding.

Be it further resolved, That the Government of the United States assume full charge of the work heretofore completed and now being performed by said Port of Portland, and provide for the maintenance of the same.

Passed by the senate January 26, 1895.

I, H. R. Kincaid, do hereby certify that I am the secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State; that the foregoing transcript of senate joint memorial No. 1 adopted at the eighteenth regular biennial session of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon has been by me compared with the original copy of the said senate joint memorial No. 1, now on file in this office, and that it is a true and correct transcript thereof and the whole of said original senate joint memorial No. 1.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 16th day of December, A. D. 1895.

H. R. KINCAID,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying that certain lands now included in the Cascade Forest Reservation in that State be released from the effect of the proclamation of the President of September 28, 1893, and that said lands be thrown open to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a resolution adopted at a stated meeting of the Washington Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States held at Seattle, Wash., on the 20th of November. I ask that this resolution, which is in the form of a memorial to Congress, be read at the desk.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that a memorial of citizens or of a legislative assembly?

Mr. SQUIRE. It is a memorial of the Loyal Legion of the State of Washington, and is very brief.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to its reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, since objection is made to its reading.

Mr. HARRIS. I am constrained to object to it. Memorials and resolutions of legislative assemblies have a right to be either read or ordered printed in the RECORD, but the memorials of private citizens can not be printed in the RECORD or read at the desk except by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I am constrained to object to filling up the RECORD with various memorials.

Mr. SQUIRE. I beg to state that this is not a memorial from private citizens, but it is from an organized body of officers and ex-officers of the Army constituting the Commandery of the Loyal Legion of Washington. In this memorial it is set forth that the Commandery of Washington of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, in recognition of the conspicuous ability and distinguished services to the nation during the late war for the preservation of the Union of Maj. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, now in command of our national armies, and in further recognition of the loyalty and valor displayed by the volunteer forces of the Union cause during that war, of which General Miles was and is an eminent representative, earnestly recommends to the Congress of the United States the revival of the grade of Lieutenant-General of the Army, to continue at least during the present incumbency of the Army commandership.

I think as a matter of respect to that body it should be published in the RECORD in the form in which it is stated by the commandery—but the exact form is not important.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a memorial of a class of citizens, but citizens still. My objection will stand.

Mr. SQUIRE. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 420) for the purchase of the oil portrait of Mrs. Dolly Madison by E. F. Andrews, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1160) for the purchase of the statue of Salmon P. Chase, late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1161) for the relief of Joseph T. Vincent; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1162) making an appropriation for the purchase of Fairbanks & Co.'s Infallible American gold and silver coin scale and counterfeit-coin detector for use in the post-offices throughout the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 1163) for the relief of Charles T. Trowbridge, George D. Walker, and John A. Trowbridge which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1164) granting a pension to Aaron B. Page; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1165) granting a pension to Robert N. Pollock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1166) for the relief of Dorence Atwater; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say with reference to the bill, that the legislature of the State of Connecticut passed a resolution asking its Senators to endeavor to secure the passage of such a bill as I have now introduced. I think the resolution was presented by my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY]. If not, I shall present it hereafter, that it may be referred to the committee to accompany the bill. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1167) for the relief of the Berdan Firearms Manufacturing Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1168) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin and the United States Regulation Firearms Company, respectively; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1169) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue Springfield rifles to each State and Territory for the National Guard thereof in exchange for other rifles now held; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAWLEY. Lest even so small a bill should add to the idiotic war scare, I wish to state that this is merely a matter of current business. In some States the National Guard have rifles that are antiquated, that are no longer manufactured, and for which they can not obtain spare parts for repairs. The Government has adopted the Krag-Jorgensen gun, and there is now a large collection of Springfield rifles on hand. The National Guard in some States wish to bring in their old useless Peabodys or other arms and have Springfield rifles issued to them instead. It is a privilege they have tried to get for several years, and the Ordnance Bureau now asks for clear legal authority to grant it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And it is to cost the Government nothing?

Mr. HAWLEY. Nothing except the cost of the Springfield rifles, minus the value of the old rifles that are turned in. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Morgan Everts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1171) to remove the charge of desertion against Hannibal S. Soule; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 1173) to increase the pension of James McCormick, of Vancouver, State of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 1174) for the relief of J. A. Towle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 1175) to authorize the Secretary of War to appoint an examining board of medical officers of the United States Army, for the purpose of examining officers upon the retired list who may have made application for restoration to active service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1176) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River, between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 1177) to pay S. W. Peel for services rendered "Old Settler" Cherokees; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 1178) conveying to Rafael Seguro, of Iberia Parish, La., the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to certain lands in said parish of Iberia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MERCHANT MARINE SERVICE AND NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 1172) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant-marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SQUIRE: Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to the bill before moving that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. President, this bill is in furtherance of justice toward the American merchant marine service. Engineers residing in various parts of the country, some of them, I am informed, in my own State and city, have had the renewal of their licenses to be engineers refused by the local boards under circumstances that savor strongly of rank injustice and favoritism. Thus it would appear that these men have been unjustly deprived of their means of livelihood.

It is one of the objects of this bill to put a stop to this injustice and furthermore to build up a still greater degree of efficiency among these important servants of commerce.

Mr. President, still another most important feature of the bill is to increase the efficiency of our Naval Reserve. When, a few years ago, a bill was passed granting, under certain conditions, a subsidy to American steamers for carrying the mails to foreign countries, there was a stipulation in that bill that these ships should be "officered by American citizens." When this bill was passed I am sure that it was the belief of every Senator that this meant that, in all parts of the ship upon which her movements and her navigation depended, the responsible men in charge—call them what you will—should be American citizens. When the steamers of the American line were accorded the privilege of carrying the American flag, and thus taking advantage of the provisions of the postal subsidy act, the managers of this great line of steamers openly and successfully contended that the provisions regarding citizenship did not apply to the engineers, because, forsooth, in the eyes of the people who control this great line, an engineer was not an "officer;" and so it goes to-day. The ships which we are annually paying a large subsidy for carrying the mails, under the supposition that they are officered by American citizens, actually have only a few real American citizens on board. The rest are foreigners upon whom we could not count in an emergency; men who have no interest in the ships save that which comes from their employment in time of peace. And thus is lost to us the very thing for which we are paying a subsidy—the building up of an American merchant marine and the officering and manning of these ships by truly American citizens, so that in the event of the services of these steamers being required by the Government in case of war with a foreign government, they would be in a condition to at once be pressed into service. As it is now, the ships of the American line are officered in their engine rooms almost entirely by foreigners, and this fact was apparent a few days ago, when the papers gave an account of a sad catastrophe on board the American liner St. Paul, where most of the engineers are not citizens of this country.

When this bill comes up for discussion I shall have something more to say on the subject, and shall endeavor to ascertain why it is that we are paying a subsidy to the steamers of this line for an ocean speed which I have heard stated they have never yet maintained in a voyage across the Atlantic—to a line which appears to be American only in name, and which for its own greed has seen fit to cry out to the civilized world that the engineers of their steamships are not "officers," and that therefore they need not be American citizens, a contention as humiliating as it is un-American. If the steamship companies which are getting subsidies from the Government do not consider their engineers officers I want Congress to make them officers in the eyes of the law, so that in case of trouble with any country requiring the services of these steamers to supplement those of the Navy, we shall have them already with their officers and crew as the act contemplated, and not as they now are, officered in their engine rooms by foreigners. Another thing which I want to see enacted into law is that these men shall be bona fide American citizens, and not merely men who have taken out their first papers and who may have no intention of going further in that direction.

I believe that wherever and under whatever circumstances Americans have served, they have acquitted themselves most creditably, and I can not believe that the engine rooms of these big steamers are such mysterious places that the American marine engineer would be a stranger there.

Our American engineers are serving creditably on vessels engaged in Oriental commerce and along the shores of Asia. I claim that they are equal to the Scotch or any other engineers. They get the best pay and perform as good service as any. Our country can depend upon them in its commerce in time of peace, and can depend upon them, if need be, in time of war.

As I said before, I shall have more to say on this subject when the bill is reported from the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Philip Hawk be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no action having been taken thereon.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the adoption of the resolution I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 600 copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1895, without appendices, be printed for the immediate use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will take probably three or four weeks anyway before the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents, can be printed, and this is simply a resolution to provide for printing 600 copies of the report proper.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the new printing act provide for the printing of reports proper, so that they can be laid before the Senate and House? I know we have had great difficulty in getting the reports of heads of Departments here because they were not printed for weeks and sometimes months.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think there is any such provision.

Mr. PLATT. If that be not the law now, certainly such action ought to be taken not only with reference to this report, but with reference to the reports of other heads of Departments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SQUIRE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to send to the Senate any information in his possession with reference to the continued improvement of the Columbia River between the mouth of the Willamette River and the city of Vancouver.

PAN-AMERICAN UNION.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas recent events have shown that European nations are making an aggressive attempt to obtain a greater foothold on the American Continent; and

Whereas such an attempt shows the necessity of a closer union of the American Republics: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United States of America should, as speedily as possible, invite all American Republics to enter into a closer union, to be known as the Pan-American Union, for the purpose of promoting the general, industrial, and commercial welfare of the members thereof, and secure said respective Republics from European or other foreign encroachment. Such union should be made of lasting benefit to the people of the several Republics forming it and a unit of value should be established and maintained therein, which shall be a full legal tender and circulate freely between the various Republics and the people thereof.

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALL. I offer a resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be printed and lie over under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of the efforts of corporations in the State of Florida, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress from the State of Florida, or to influence the legislation of Congress; also to investigate and report to the Senate whether corrupt means, bribery, or free transportation have been or are being used to influence such elections in the State of Florida; also to inquire and report to the Senate whether the use of such influences or means is consistent with the preservation of the Republic of the United States and the rights and liberties of the people, and to report a bill for the prevention of such practices.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule and be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALL. I have a resolution in my hand, sent to me by the Knights of Labor, with a request that I shall present it. I ask leave to submit the resolution, and that it lie on the table and be printed.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and are hereby, directed to furnish, as soon as practicable, for the information of the Senate, a statement showing—

First. The names of all streets, avenues, alleys, and reservations in the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown which are partially or wholly unpaved, and the total length thereof so unpaved; also the length thereof unsewered; also the length thereof without water mains, together with the estimated cost of fully improving the same.

Second. An estimate of the full amount required to carry out the provisions of the act of March 2, 1893, to provide a permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; the total number of feet of land in streets, avenues, and reservations required to be condemned in each subdivision or piece of land and the value of the same; the number and estimated value of buildings required to be condemned to carry out the provisions of said act in such districts as are prepared by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; the total number of feet of land in streets, avenues, etc., in each subdivision or piece of land that will be abandoned, and the amount and nature of improvements of such streets, avenues, etc., the amount of said improvements at public and private expense. Also an estimate of the cost of fully improving said streets, avenues, and reservations by grading, paving, sewering, and laying water mains, building bridges, culverts, etc., in such streets, avenues, and reservations as are to be condemned by the provisions of said highway act. An estimate of the value of property held by the United States, and the assessed value of private property held in the county, outside of Washington and Georgetown.

Third. A statement showing the amount of taxes collected in the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county, respectively, by years, from 1878 to 1894, both inclusive, and in like manner the amount expended in each of said sections by the District of Columbia for the same period.

Fourth. The amount of the revenues of the District of Columbia applied by the Treasurer of the United States to liquidate any undue debt of the District of Columbia to the United States or other parties from 1878 to 1895 and from what fund taken and to what debt applied, and if any of such revenue has been refunded and the amount and time of such refunding; an estimate of the amount of the revenues of the District of Columbia that will remain above the appropriation asked for at the end of the years 1895 and 1896.

REMOVAL OF MILITARY DISABILITIES.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I introduced the other day a bill in reference to the employment of officers in the Army of the United States. The title of the bill is "A bill (S. 1034) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 416 of the laws of 1884," the provision which I desire to have repealed having been incorporated into the statutes and then afterwards amended. I did not recite in the title the object of the bill, nor did I place in the bill itself a copy of the section proposed to be repealed. I desire to call up that bill now and supply those two defects by offering the bill I send to the desk as a substitute, which simply changes the title so as to read: "A bill to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States." Then I desire to incorporate in the bill itself a copy of the section referred to which is proposed to be repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a word about the bill.

Mr. HILL. Let the bill I have now introduced be first read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should vote for a bill accomplishing the object which the Senator desires, to remove the discrimination which has been made against those who were engaged in the Confederate service during the war. The time has passed for such discrimination. I think it ought to be repealed, but I think it would come with much more effect and in much better form and manner to have the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and let that committee report it to the Senate in the regular way. That is my opinion. The Senate can pass a bill of this kind, if it chooses, without a reference; but it does seem to me that the ordinary formal way is the better way, especially in a case like this, where a stigma is sought to be removed from a great mass of people.

Mr. HILL. The bill is unusual in its character, it is true, because the law now existing is itself unusual, and I thought the bill might be permitted to take an unusual course. There is nothing in it requiring special consideration by any committee. It is a simple proposition, which is to take from the statute books the old proscriptive statute which forbids the employment in the Army of the United States of those who formerly held commissions in that Army and who subsequently joined the Confederate army. I thought that it would be a good thing just before Christmas to give this present to the old Confederates. I consulted with several members of the Military Committee, all of whom seemed to favor the proposition.

The objection made the other day was simply to the form of the bill, that there was not recited in its title or in the bill itself the statute proposed to be repealed.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I have some recollection of this proscriptive statute on a former occasion in the Senate of the United States, but I do not now recollect whether the prohibition of certain citizens from fighting in the armies of the United States applied only to those who had formerly been officers in the Army of the United States and had resigned their commissions and taken service in the Confederate cause or to all who held commissions from the Confederate States. I am asking for information.

Mr. HILL. The present law only applies to those who held formerly commissions in the Army of the United States and subsequently joined the Confederate army, the previous general restriction having been changed in 1884; and now my proposition is simply to wipe out the remaining restriction.

Mr. COCKRELL. How old were those men in 1861 who held commissions in the United States Army and went into the Confederate army?

Mr. HILL. They were young lieutenants, I suppose.

Mr. COCKRELL. They must have been over 21 years of age.

Mr. HILL. I presume they were.

Mr. COCKRELL. And this was thirty-four years ago. That would make them at least 55 years of age if they were only 21 years old at that time, and, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], a great many of them were 25, 30, and 40 years old.

Mr. HILL. Then that objection would only restrict the number to which the statute would apply.

I have received numerous letters from various parts of the South saying that their people approved this bill, and would regard it as a most generous act on the part of Congress to pass it. I received this morning a copy of resolutions passed by the Virginia house of delegates upon this very question, expressing the hope that such a bill may pass.

It is a simple proposition. It requires no deliberation. I concede the general propriety of the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer all bills about which there is any question to committees. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who objected to the immediate consideration of the bill the other day, is entirely satisfied, as I understand, with the proposition in its present form, and I hope the Senator from Ohio in this one instance may be willing to depart from the usual order and allow the bill to be now considered and passed as a Christmas present to these old officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, when this bill was introduced a few days ago by the honorable Senator from New York I concurred with the Senator from Connecticut in thinking it had better lie over a day, especially as it needed an amendment in the matter of form, which amendment has now been made by the Senator from New York, so that the bill is in accord with the views of the Senator from Connecticut as to its propriety in that respect.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are two Senators from Connecticut, and the Senator, I suppose, refers to my colleague.

Mr. CHANDLER. I refer to the Senator from Connecticut who sits near me [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HAWLEY. I mention that because he was the one who made the objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was the Senator from Connecticut who sits near me who made the suggestion. It would have satisfied me quite as well if this bill had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and reported from that committee; but now that it is before the Senate, it seems to me it ought to be passed, and it ought to be passed to-day. It is simple in its character. Whatever disabilities there were upon citizens who, having held commissions in the Union Army, afterwards aided in the war of secession, have been removed. This bill proposes a simple repeal of whatever disabilities there are upon the statute book, and from the time of this repeal the old Confederate soldiers and officers will stand, with no disability upon them whatever, the equals in all respects before national law of Union soldiers and citizens who adhered to the Union cause.

Mr. President, thirty years having elapsed since the close of the war, there is no reason for keeping the disability provision upon the statute books; there is abundant reason for removing it therefrom, and as we the other day, unanimously, without distinction of political party, came to the support of a Democratic President when he announced national principles in reference to foreign affairs, so I hope that to-day, without delay, without criticism, without amendment, and freely and generously, this bill may be passed by the affirmative voice of every Senator in this Chamber.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, ordinarily I should be in accord with the Senator from New York in his motion to consider at once the proposition to repeal this provision of the statutes, which it is high time should be effaced from the face of the statute book of this country; but I am inclined to think that the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that this proposition should go to the Committee on Military Affairs is a proper one, because I have been in the Senate long enough to remember with some distinctness that a few years ago, when the proposition was made in the way of an amendment to a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by its then distinguished chairman, Senator Logan, of Illinois, to repeal this provision, although the general sentiment on this side of the Chamber was to acquiesce in the increase of the Regular Army, which was proposed by that bill, that amendment was voted down with a degree of unanimity on the other side of the Chamber which was somewhat surprising to me then, as I was new in the Senate. That brought about the defeat of what I then thought was a very wise proposition for the increase of the Regular Army. Therefore I think that this bill perhaps had better go to the committee, in order that we may find out whether that sentiment still continues in the Senate, or whether a sentiment that so emphatically disapproved the removal of this prohibition in the "piping times of peace" has been reversed in these more warlike times. At all events, it seems to me that, without some evidence that there has been some real change of sentiment and heart in that direction, we had better have the deliberation of a committee upon the bill, so that sentiment may have a chance to be heard.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am not exactly satisfied with the temper displayed here by a noncombatant. There was a great deal of "unanimity of feeling" on both sides of Appomattox and Gettysburg and other places, but that was some time ago, and a dozen years ago we had probably not got over all our feeling on that subject. Neither was this statute proscriptive. It was a perfectly just law at the time it was originally passed. I personally know many of the men to be affected by this bill and have nothing to say against their personal honor. I hold for many of them a very warm personal affection; but a government that respected itself could not, upon the close of a terrible war like that, take into its Regular Army men who were educated at the expense of the Government to be our champions in defense of the country, but after serving for a time in honorable and high places went off, almost in the night, some of them, to engage in the great rebellion. The country simply said that no person who had served in any capacity in that war should hold an office, etc. That was in 1866. Some years after that, in 1884, the statute was modified. That I may be precise in my statements I will read the statutes. The act of July 20, 1866, said:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

That was when there were hundreds of thousands of men who had just laid down their arms—compelled to do so by superior force. It was one of the reasonable things done at that time.

Before that statute was passed we were in the habit of freely enlisting into the Regular Army as privates men who had not got cold in their desertion from the Confederate ranks. I know it, because I forwarded some men from the line who came about 800 yards and joined us, and in some cases were exceedingly anxious to go into our Army, making only one condition, that they should be sent out to the plains, so that they should not be captured in the South and be hanged. There was no objection in our laws to taking them to help put down the rebellion. These were private soldiers, and after the war and after the passage of the aforesaid statute they could not have been enlisted.

But in 1884 the statute was modified to read in this way:

No person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion and afterwards served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States.

That excluded only officers who were graduates of West Point and Annapolis before the war and held office in the Regular Army. The time has passed——

Mr. FRYE. The statute of 1884 repealed the former law?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, distinctly. It is entitled "An act amending the Revised Statutes of the United States in respect of official oaths, and for other purposes."

Mr. HILL. "So as to read as follows"—taking the place of the other statute.

Mr. HAWLEY. "So as to read as follows;" and that was one of the sections. There were one, two, three, four sections of this amendatory act. I have read the first one, that confines the prohibition to United States ex army and navy officers who went into the rebellion. The Senator from Delaware says that a proposition to remove the disability came before us some years ago and was rejected, all the Republican Senators so voting.

Mr. GRAY. What year was that?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not remember when it came up.

Mr. GRAY. 1887 or 1889?

Mr. HAWLEY. It certainly did not hurt my feelings very much or I should have remembered something about the occasion. Probably our people thought it was a little early to be taking off all marks of disapproval of the rebellion. By and by somebody will want to strike the word "rebellion" out of the Constitution of the United States. There is such a thing as going too far in this matter. But as for pardoning, and removing of this restriction, or saying that these old fellows who went from West Point or Annapolis into the rebellion may fight now if they can, I have not the slightest objection; for, so far as I know, they would all fight for the flag if they could. If there be any man who is still so sore that he would not do so under any circumstances, may the Lord "send him repentance and a better mind."

I think the formal, forceful way to do things of this character is to do them in response to a committee report; but I am not particular enough about that to make an objection.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire in this connection, Mr. President, to ask that there may be associated with this bill—if it shall be referred, and if not, that it lie on the table—a resolution adopted by the house of delegates and the senate of Virginia indorsing the message of the President, and also expressing "the wish that the statute providing that no person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late war between the States and who afterwards served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the Confederate States shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States, should be repealed," and heartily indorsing the bill offered for that purpose.

I beg leave to say in this connection that I have heard with gratification the sentiments expressed by the Senators who have approved of the passage of this bill at this time. I have for successive years, as a member of the Senate, taken the liberty to introduce a bill of like import, and I have regretted that it has not received the early attention and action of the committee of this body to which it has been referred and of this body.

I beg leave further to say that those of us who have the honor to represent portions of the South in this body and those of us who were in the Confederate army have never realized the necessity or expediency of any such statute upon the statute books of this nation. When we were soldiers of the Confederate States, we were its soldiers and loyal to it. When the Confederate soldiers laid down their arms, they laid them down and were done with fighting; and it has been their desire ever since to obliterate the disagreeable memories of the war and that we should be in act as we are in fact one people with a common country.

I shall make no disagreeable allusions on this occasion, for I do not feel the sentiments which might inspire them, if they still lurk in other breasts; but I hope I may be indulged to say that as to the West Pointers and Annapolis men, I have never seen that any difference existed between them and any others who took up arms for the Confederate States. The basis upon which all classes in the South took up arms to defend its cause in the late fratricidal war was that their loyalty was due to the States which summoned them into service, and that principle comprehended the men who had been educated at one place as well as at another.

Besides, sir, it is not to be forgotten that if young men of the South were educated at Annapolis and at West Point their States contributed to this Government the means which supplied the funds for their education proportionately with all other States of the Union who educated their sons in like manner, and at the end of the argument the fact existed that the community to whom the West Pointers and others gave their services themselves supplied the means of those services according to the Constitution and laws of the country, which distributed taxation proportionately and justly upon all sections.

I say thus much, sir, simply to call attention to that fact; but it is hardly necessary to go into the minutia and detail of arguments which have applied to former times and to former conditions, "All's well that ends well," and if this matter shall end in inducing a more patriotic and friendly sentiment, North and South, East and West, it will have accomplished a good purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire now to submit the motion to refer the bill introduced by the Senator from New York to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I look upon this simply as a form, a manner of doing a gracious and proper thing. After this long period of time I shall not even stop to debate the proprieties of the measure, but I prefer to have the bill referred to the committee in the ordinary way, rather than to have it brought in in an unusual way and sought to be put upon its passage without even having been read. I think it will be much more pleasant to the people who will be affected by the bill if, upon the proposition submitted by the honorable Senator from New York, we should have a report by the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], who was himself a distinguished Confederate soldier and who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and in the ordinary course of business that would be done. Why we should make any difference in our mode of procedure I can not see. I wish to vote for the bill, but I wish to see it take its regular course in the progress of our business.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I am inclined to think with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that it would add weight to the measure if it should be referred to and regularly reported back by the Committee on Military Affairs. Having said that, I desire to state that I am ready to vote for a measure of this kind in any form. I attach no great importance to it now except as an expression. It is an expression of nationality, of brotherhood, of total reconciliation, and the last process of healing all that has passed.

In rising, however, I desired more than anything else to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to a few points of history which perhaps have been overlooked, to show how little the men of the South who went into the Confederate army have been distrusted by this Government, and how much of pretense there is in the legislation which has been read to us and in the statement that we have feared to employ them. I desire to call attention to the fact that long years ago the Senate of the United States, when very strongly partisan—I say it with great respect—confirmed General Longstreet as collector of the port of New Orleans—a West Point man, a hard fighter, and a Confederate soldier. Nobody was afraid and nobody got hurt. It may be answered that that was a civil office, but I belong to the school of men who believe that a man who is fit to hold a civil office can be trusted in any office, can be trusted in a military office.

Mr. GRAY. And can be trusted to fight for his country.

Mr. VOORHEES. And can be trusted to fight for his country. I have never for a moment, and the world has never for a moment believed that those men would be false to the Government under any circumstances from the time they surrendered in good faith at Appomattox. I do not believe there is a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who in his heart entertains any such feeling.

We confirmed here that great military leader, second only to Lee on the Southern side, Joseph E. Johnston, as Commissioner of the great Pacific railroad system. We have confirmed in the Senate within the last two or three years, or less than that, I believe, a gentleman who is in my mind. He was a West Point cadet, a West Point graduate, and in the Army, though very young, and went to the other side and fought all the way through. Nobody has ever impugned his honor.

I remember General Maury, who was an officer of the old Army. I was reading his book the other day when I was down at Hot Springs, and a most charming book it is. It details the frontier history of the army movements when he was with it, and then continuanda in the shape of history gives an account of proceedings while he was in the Confederate army. We confirmed him to some foreign mission. I do not now recall what it was, but I think it was one of the South American missions. I have no doubt that if I took a little more time I could recall a dozen instances within the last thirty years where West Pointers in the Regular Army, who went into the Confederate army, have been confirmed by this body. The instances I have mentioned occurred to me as I sat in my seat, and I do not speak of them to reproach anybody. On the contrary, it has been highly creditable—creditable to this body, creditable to the manhood of the United States, creditable to American sentiment everywhere.

The law on the statute books has been a dead letter. If the services of those men had been needed in military affairs the law would have vanished. Their services are not needed now, and they never will be needed. The men are being mustered out. I suppose there are not fifteen living on the shores of time. They are going. It is a pleasant thing to do. Let us bid them good-bye in this way, and say to them that the last vestige of a prejudice—no, it was not born of that, either, it was a pretense of distrust that never existed, and the record of this body shows it—is removed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it is perhaps proper that I should say a word with reference to the objection I interposed the other day when the bill was first introduced. A bill was introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] repealing section 1218 of the Revised Statutes as amended by chapter 46 of the act of 1884. The bill did not state what it was that it was proposed to repeal, except by giving the title of the act in the Revised Statutes and in the statutes of 1884. It was read amidst considerable confusion, so that it was difficult to understand from the reading at the desk what it was proposed to do. I suggested that it was a novel thing to ask for the passage of a bill upon its first reading, and it was soon suggested, I think by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that the bill was not in the form required by our rules. Therefore I objected to further proceedings on the first reading of the bill, insisting upon the observance of the rules and the order of the Senate with reference to the passage of bills.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] also explained that he thought it was a very opportune time to pass the bill. It was when the Senate was laboring under considerable excitement caused by the sending here of a message by the President, and I took occasion to say that I did not think there was going to be any war until after the recess of the Senate, certainly. I felt then, as I feel now, that all this war talk throughout the nation had been unwise and I will say almost insane. I did not think there was any occasion for the immediate hurrying of the bill through the Senate because there had been a message sent to the Senate with reference to a possible difference between this country and Great Britain. I said then that very probably we should all vote for the bill when we had an opportunity to examine it. I certainly have been ready to vote for it. I should prefer that it came in the ordinary way and took the ordinary course of bills in the Senate.

This country has forgiven a great deal, Mr. President, and it is ready to forgive more. We all believe that those officers of West Point and Annapolis who held commissions in the Army at the breaking out of the rebellion and who joined the Confederate forces are now loyal to the flag, and if they were not too old, as they are, would fight for it if it became necessary to fight. So the suggestion of delay or of reference which was made was not made in any spirit of bitterness; it was not the result of a prejudice felt anywhere against those officers; nor was it with the intention of objecting to the removal of their disability. We have removed this disability from the privates who fought against us. We have, I think, removed political disabilities from every man who fought in the Confederate army against us, and there remain under disability only those officers who, holding commissions in our Army and Navy at the time of the breaking out of the war, joined the Confederate forces. We have removed those disabilities cheerfully and not grudgingly, and yet everything that we have done, as well as everything that we are ready to do, is misunderstood and is not received in the section of country in which the rebellion started in the spirit in which it is offered.

The fact that on the day when the bill was presented I suggested that it ought to take the regular course seems to have stirred once more the Southern heart. The newspapers from one end of the South to the other have taken occasion to laud the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] as a patriot, and to condemn me as wanting in every attribute of patriotism. They have applied all sorts of epithets to me, and then have been very careful to send me a marked copy of each paper containing the articles. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I have examined the bill; I am satisfied that it is in proper form; that it effectuates the purposes the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] has in view; and I am so full of forgiveness this morning, on the day before Christmas, that I am willing to join with the Senator from New York and present this Christmas gift to the officers who fought in the Confederate army and who, I believe, would rejoice to fight in our Army, the Army of the whole country, under the flag of the United States, if the opportunity presented itself, of which I believe there is no prospect, present or remote.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I believe that I am the only Senator on this side of the Chamber who served as a private soldier in the Union Army during the war and carried a musket during the entire time. My experience was with the grandest soldier the world has ever seen, in my judgment—the late George H. Thomas. If I have any prejudices coming to me from youth or from early association, those prejudices would be against the passage of the bill, but I have none.

To indulge in a little ancient history, I remember distinctly that on the 9th of April, 1865, when Lee surrendered at Appomattox, the branch of the Army in which I served had the honor of assaulting the fortifications of Fort Blakely, Ala., of which my honorable friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], was in command. My distinct recollection is that we captured the honorable Senator and his entire command. There are on this side of the Chamber five or six gentlemen who were in command of Confederate troops whose forces, I remember, were confronted by the branch of the Army in which I served.

I think if such a bill had been presented to the Congress of the United States ten or fifteen years ago it would have been the proper thing to have passed it.

Mr. GRAY. Such a bill was presented seven years ago.

Mr. ALLEN. If a measure of this kind had been presented ten or fifteen years ago it would have been the proper thing to have enacted it into a law. This country has lived upon prejudice ever since the close of the war. There has never been a Presidential campaign since that time in this country in which the "bloody shirt" or the questions arising out of the war have not been resurrected and fought over and analyzed and reduced to their last results.

The trouble is that there has been too much of this kind of talk North and South. Appeals have been made to prejudice for party sake. I know it has been so in the North. I have heard it since the days of the close of the rebellion. In every Presidential campaign the issues growing out of the war have been presented to the people, and the ignorant, and the vicious, and the suspicious have been appealed to to follow the fortunes of the Republican flag. I am told that the same thing is true or has been true to some extent in the South; that the fires of sectional prejudice have been fanned into a flame from time to time there, too. Is it not surprising that thirty years have elapsed before a scene of this kind should be witnessed in the United States Senate? Here are men who are bound together, members of a common race, speaking a common language, with a common inheritance, and is it not strange that a third of a century should elapse after a great event like the war for the Union before a simple measure like this can pass without objection?

What would our country have been if after the days of reconstruction we had had the statesmanship and the manhood and the common sense to bury the issues growing out of the war and had all united in giving our strength to building up the waste places and to making this the grandest country upon the face of the earth, as I believe it is? Why should we have waited until now, just at a time when the country is in a condition, as it would appear, where we are likely to engage in a foreign war, before we are willing to relieve these men from this restriction? It seems to me that it is cowardly. It seems to me that we have waited until apparently we are in need of the services of these gentlemen, and then at the last moment we say to them, "We will make you a Christmas present of a release from the restrictions which have been placed upon you." I suppose if war had not been threatened, if Mr. Cleveland had not twisted the English lion's tail so vigorously within the last week or so, we would never have heard of a measure for releasing these soldiers from this restriction.

In fact, it has passed through my mind, and if I am wrong I desire the senior Senator from New York to correct me, that possibly this measure came upon the heels of the Venezuelan message to forge the lightning in Washington in order that it might thunder throughout the South. Why did not this measure come before? If Senators upon the other side are so anxious for the measure to pass, if they believe it to be just, and I certainly believe it to be just, why was it not introduced in this Chamber and passed through Congress at a time when there was no threat of a foreign war? No, measures like this have been held back for the purpose of dividing the people of this country, lining them up on one side as Republicans, appealing to their passions to follow the flag which came successfully through the rebellion, and upon the other side appealing to the passions of the more ignorant portion of the South.

It would have been an act of justice, Mr. President, to have passed such a bill years ago. While I do not approve of placing back in the public service a man who has once violated his oath of allegiance to this country, if there had been that statesmanship at the head of the affairs of this country that there should have been, if there had been that disposition in public life that there should have been to heal up the scars of the war, such a measure would have passed here years ago. Those men would have been released from their disabilities and the country would have been united in sentiment from North to South and prepared for this or any other emergency. But now, at the last moment, at a time when it may seem that the country is liable to be plunged into a foreign war, then comes this tardy measure to those men. They are invited at 60 and 70 years of age to take their places in the Army if the exigencies of the times should require it.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] can be induced to withdraw his motion, and that the bill may pass without further consideration.

Mr. HILL. I do not quite understand whether the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has actually made a motion to refer the bill. I ask for information whether he has done so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] entered a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the pending motion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word. I did not suppose that my simple suggestion would have occasioned this lengthy debate. I had hoped that the bill might be taken up and passed. The discussion we have had, however, illustrates one of the peculiarities of doing business in the Senate of the United States. Everybody has heard the bill read, everybody understands it, everybody is in favor of it, for divers reasons, and yet nobody wants to have it passed to-day. It must be referred to a committee that knows all about it; the committee must take time to consider it and then report it to the Senate, and we must go through these useless forms.

I labored under the idea that if only last week the Senate of the United States could afford to take up a great measure affecting the welfare and honor of the country, and which in its consequences might involve us in peace or war, and pass it unanimously without its reference to any committee at all, the Senate would not scruple over a little bill to give to the old Confederates this Christmas present. Strain at a gnat and swallow a camel is the spectacle presented. I recollect that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day made a motion to refer that, the most important bill which has passed the Senate for many a year, and then failed to press his motion. He failed even to vote for it himself, so far as the RECORD shows. Others who spoke in favor of the reference of the bill did not desire to put themselves on record.

Now, the other day the objection was raised that there was something the matter with the form of the bill which I introduced, and Senators on the other side very quickly suggested that it was not in accordance with the rules—the same old rules about which we hear so much. They said there was a rule requiring that the statute proposed to be repealed should be set forth. I said that I doubted the existence of such a rule. There is no such rule, Mr. President. There has not been any such rule. The Senators looked at it subsequently and became convinced that there was not. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] then made an objection to the bill on the ground of propriety, saying that the statute proposed to be repealed should be set forth in full, and I agreed to it. I regret that there has been any criticism upon his conduct in any Southern papers. I have only one complaint to make of him, and that is that if he has received a lot of notices complimentary to myself and in condemnation of himself he ought at least to have sent them to me, in order that I might have seen the complimentary notices, as I receive so few of them nowadays in the press. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I think the Senate would vote almost unanimously for the bill to-day and would vote down the motion of the Senator from Ohio. There is some question as to whether a quorum would appear on a vote, as there are so many pairs. I do not care to have a division upon the bill. I should have preferred that we should have passed it after a few remarks had been made. But the Senator from Ohio, who now seems to be absent, has not withdrawn his motion, and probably finds the task of taking his lunch more agreeable than discussing the bill. I think that by reason of the situation I should not press the bill at this time. Let the motion of the Senator from Ohio prevail. Let the bill take the ordinary and usual course, and Senators will then be satisfied when it comes up again. It will be safe in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs, as at present constituted, or in the hands of the new committee, of which I understand the gallant Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is to be chairman. Let that course be taken, and when we return after Christmas we can take up and pass the bill, I presume, in the same way that the other bill was passed a few days ago—unanimously.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that course will not be taken. After the discussion which has taken place it seems to me it would raise the question whether there is a unanimous desire in the Senate to pass a bill of this kind. I think everyone now ought to put an end to this whole matter, and inasmuch as there has been discussion with regard to a reference of the bill, if it should be referred it would look like a controverted question. I do not like to have the Senate put in that position. I think, under the circumstances, we ought, by unanimous consent, to pass the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be referred and be done with it.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that course will not be taken.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I heard from several the expression just made by the Senator from Missouri. I think myself that now the bill might as well go to the committee. I was entirely willing to take it up and pass it.

I wish to say in justice to my colleague [Mr. PLATT], who is temporarily absent, that whatever objection he made the other day was purely technical, as I suppose he has explained. I think that of course there is no rule that requires in a repealing or a modifying statute a repetition of the whole of the old law, but I think my colleague had in mind that whether it be a rule or not it is a frequent criticism in the Senate when a bill is introduced that it fails to indicate in the title the subject-matter thereof, which it always ought to do, and if it repeals or modifies another statute it ought to refer to that statute. That is what I suppose my colleague had in mind.

It is in a certain sense a mortifying thing that we could not have discussed this matter this morning without observations that brought back the condemnations and disabilities of the Confederates during and after the war, or indicated that now we have yielded on our side, and consented to repeal an act of injustice; that we are just beginning to do justice to our friends on the other side; that we were proscriptive at that time, and things of that sort. When we have made up our minds that we are friends, and that we are willing to brush away these things, willing to clear the table, now that the thing is well over with, the short and cordial way to do it is to say, "Yes; shake."

Mr. GRAY and others. Question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLS. I do not wish it to appear that the bill goes to the committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. BATE. I desire to say that I am opposed to a reference of the bill to the committee.

Mr. MILLS. I shall vote against its reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. CARTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. MCBRIDE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." I do not know how the Senator from New Hampshire would vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS]. I should vote "nay" if I were not paired.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the negative). Is the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] recorded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. DAVIS. I voted "nay," but I am compelled to withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I ought to state that my colleague [Mr. THURSTON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber to-day.

Mr. GEAR. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. HAWLEY. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Bacon,	Elkins,	Gray,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Frye,	Sherman,	Walthall.

NAYS—30.

Allen,	Daniel,	Murphy,	Squire,
Baker,	Harris,	Nelson,	Stewart,
Bate,	Hawley,	Peffer,	Vest.
Brice,	Hill,	Perkins,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Jones, Nev.	Platt,	Wetmore,
Cameron,	Lodge,	Pritchard,	White.
Chandler,	Martin,	Roach,
Clark,	Morrill,	Shoup,

NOT VOTING—47.

Aldrich,	Dubois,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Kyle,	Pugh,
Berry,	Gallinger,	McBride,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Gear,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Blanchard,	George,	Mantle,	Smith,
Burrows,	Gibson,	Mills,	Thurston,
Caffery,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Tillman,
Call,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Wis.	Turpie,
Carter,	Hale,	Morgan,	Vilas,
Chilton,	Hansbrough,	Palmer,	Warren,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Pasco,	Wilson.
Davis,	Irby,	Pettigrew.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to state that I delayed giving my vote until the end of the call to see if I could ascertain what was the choice of the ex-Confederates.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

PRESENT.

Allen,	Chandler,	Lodge,	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Clark,	McBride,	Pugh,
Baker,	Cockrell,	Martin,	Roach,
Bate,	Daniel,	Mills,	Sherman,
Berry,	Davis,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Shoup,
Brice,	Elkins,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Frye,	Murphy,	Teller,
Butler,	Gear,	Nelson,	Vest,
Caffery,	Gray,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Call,	Harris,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Cameron,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Carter,	Hill,	Platt,	White.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. TURPIE] has been called home to Indiana on matters of importance, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. If the Senator from Minnesota desires to do so, he can vote on this measure. I feel certain that it would not interfere with the terms of his pair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will again call the roll on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a majority of the Senate are rather desirous of passing the bill before Christmas Day, as evidenced by the vote, I will withdraw my motion to refer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio withdraws his motion to refer. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, which section is as follows: "No person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion, and afterwards served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection, during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (S. 1034) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884 will be postponed indefinitely.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of the appropriation for materials and miscellaneous expenses for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year 1896 for the purchase of articles provided for in the appropriation for the miscellaneous expenses of the Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of the same for the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

COAST DEFENSE ESTIMATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. PROCTOR on the 21st instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what amount of money can be advantageously used for the purpose of coast defense prior to July 1, 1897, and what portion of said amount should be made available during the present fiscal year; also an estimate of what portion of the amount would be required for sites for fortifications, and how much for engineering, and how much for ordnance work, and whether the requisite number of heavy guns can be supplied from the Government shops, and if not, whether the deficiency can be manufactured by private plants in this country.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that resolution will be passed over for the present. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is not here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 23d instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-house at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.

COINAGE OF SILVER BULLION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. VEST on the 21st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, in pursuance of the existing law vesting in him full power so to do, to coin as rapidly as possible the silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, into standard dollars, and with such dollars to redeem, cancel, and retire the Treasury notes of the United States of July 14, 1890, issued in the purchase of such bullion, and also to redeem the United States notes commonly called "greenbacks" in standard silver dollars as well as in gold, using whichever may be most abundant or convenient.

Mr. VEST. I ask leave to modify the resolution by presenting a substitute for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted as a substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to coin as rapidly as possible the silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, into standard silver dollars, and with such dollars to redeem the Treasury notes issued for the purpose of purchasing said bullion when offered for redemption, such notes to be destroyed so soon as they are redeemed.

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall also redeem the Treasury notes, commonly called greenbacks, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins or both, as the condition of the Treasury may require. And said notes, commonly called greenbacks, when so redeemed, shall be reissued as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution just read.

Mr. HILL. What course does the Senator from Missouri desire concerning the resolution?

Mr. VEST. I should like to have a vote upon it, if there is a quorum here.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. Is it a joint resolution?

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Missouri has changed it to a joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was a simple Senate resolution, the Chair will state, but it has been changed to a joint resolution.

Mr. HILL. I desire to make some remarks to the Senate upon this general subject, about which the Senate has heard so little lately. I do not suppose that a vote can be had upon the resolution to-day, and I do not know how long the Senate intends to remain in session. I ask the Senator from Missouri whether he desires to speak upon the resolution?

Mr. VEST. I do not.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the pending resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Obviously most Senators supposed, on leaving the Chamber a few moments ago, that the Senate was about to adjourn. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, December 27, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 24, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under Rule XXIV, clause 2, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a reply to the resolution of the House relating to the allotment of Wichita Indian lands in the Territory of Oklahoma, and also transmitting accompanying documents; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Upper White River, Ark.; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the cases of James T. S. Greenfield and others against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting the report of the operations of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 480) granting a pension to William B. Matchett;

A bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene;

A bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood;

A bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill;

A bill (S. 404) granting a pension to Samuel Goldwater;

A bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall; and

A bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 2264) fixing the times for holding the circuit court and district courts of the northern district of Iowa and of the southern district of Iowa.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized to employ such clerical aid as he may find necessary in the copying, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, of the messages of the Presidents of the United States from the Journals of the Senate and House and the Executive Journals for the printing thereof, and that the expense therefor, not to exceed $600, be paid out of the appropriation for public printing and binding.

PALM BEACH, FLA., A SUBPORT OF ENTRY AND DELIVERY.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which I send to the Clerk to report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2720) to make Palm Beach, Fla., a subport of entry and delivery.

Be it enacted, etc.—

SECTION 1. That Palm Beach, in the State of Florida, shall be, and is hereby, made a subport of entry and delivery, and a customs officer, or such officers, shall be stationed at said subport with authority to enter and clear vessels, receive duties, fees, and other moneys and perform such other services and receive such compensation as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the exigencies of commerce may require.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to make an inquiry as to the nature of this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I will state to the House that the bill has been submitted to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the original was drawn under the direction of Mr. Hamlin, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to meet present exigencies. The necessity for the bill is this: Mr. Flagler, the owner of the East Coast Railroad and the great Florida hotels, has just put on an American steamship line to run between the Bahamas and Palm Beach, and the first of the steamers will arrive at Palm Beach on the morning of the 17th.

It has been discovered that Palm Beach is within the boundaries of the port of entry of Key West, which is on the other side of the State, and not of St. Augustine, as was supposed. It would take a week to enter and clear these steamers from Key West by having to send the papers around through the northern part of the State by Palatka and Jacksonville and down to Tampa, and by triweekly steamer to Key West; so that it renders it practically impossible to get a prompt entry and clearance, and it will prevent the accommodation of a great deal of commerce which will be brought to Florida by this line unless we empower the Treasury to authorize a deputy collector or other officer to enter and clear these vessels there. This bill will merely authorize the stationing of a deputy or inspector to enter and clear these vessels at Palm Beach as a subport of entry.

Mr. PAYNE. Will it require any new official or render necessary any additional or new expense?

Mr. COOPER of Florida. It will not require an expenditure of probably more than $3 or $4 a day for a deputy or inspector; but the expense will be more than offset by the receipts from customs dues from this line. It is necessary that it should be got through this House, through the Senate, and signed by the 17th. It is a matter of great importance to the State of Florida, and important to American marine interests in the way I have stated, and therefore I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I think a matter involving the creation of a new official ought to go to the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I beg that the gentleman will not object. I submitted the bill to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, as I stated, the bill is drawn under the direction of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not organized, and will not be in a condition to consider business until after the holidays, and therefore the vessels which are to land at that place will be unable to transact business unless this authority is given. It is a very meritorious measure, and it affects practical business, and for that reason I ask that the bill may be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLERKS TO CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce the resolution which I send to the desk and ask its reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairmen of the following committees, to wit, the Committees on Ways and Means, Appropriations, Judiciary, Banking and Currency, Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Rivers and Harbors, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Public Lands, Indian Affairs, Public Buildings and Grounds, Invalid Pensions, Pensions, Claims, War Claims, and District of Columbia, are hereby authorized to appoint a personal clerk, who shall receive the same compensation and for the same period, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, as is received by the clerks of other members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks to introduce this resolution and to have it referred to the Committee on Accounts. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the enrolled copy of the joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of the appropriation for materials and miscellaneous expenses for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year 1896 for the purchase of articles provided for in the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses of the Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of the same for the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896; when the Speaker signed the same.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CATRON, Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, to be a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BUCK, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WOODMAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MONEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

OPENING OF WICHITA RESERVATION.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a resolution of inquiry was introduced by the Delegate from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] in regard to the delays which he alleged had occurred in the opening of the Wichita Reservation. The Chair will remember that some debate took place upon that matter, to which there was scarcely any reply on this side. But the Secretary of the Interior has sent to the House a letter in answer to the resolution, couched in very temperate terms, and I ask, in justice to him, that his letter, omitting the exhibits, may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of the reply of the Secretary of the Interior to an inquiry made by the House some time ago.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Delegate from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] is not here, and that that matter should go over until he returns. Therefore I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] objects.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will suggest that the printing of the letter can do no injustice to the Delegate from Oklahoma, but will rather furnish him with matters in printed form to which he himself may want to refer. It is but common justice to print in the RECORD the answer of the Secretary required by the House, as the RECORD was the medium of attack upon him. There has hitherto been no answer to the strictures made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN], and this paper merely gives the official facts. Of course there will be no objection on this side to any debate which the gentleman from Oklahoma may see fit to invoke when he returns. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the matter go over until the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] is present.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Has it occurred to the gentleman that perhaps the gentleman from Oklahoma himself would like to see this in print?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I should like to have him so state before giving my consent.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I am powerless to resist the gentleman's objection.

Subsequently,

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. Is there further objection to the printing of the Secretary's reply in the RECORD?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I object, Mr. Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY NEXT.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a resolution distributing the reference of the President's annual message to the various committees, and to recommend the adoption of the resolution.

I will state that under the rules this resolution would go to the Calendar, but I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is the ordinary resolution for the distribution of the President's annual message.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution distributing the President's message. That will give consideration in the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session as relates to the national finances, the public debt, including bond issues, to the public revenues, to treaties relating to revenue questions, to our trade relations with foreign countries, and to the wants and condition of the Treasury be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to foreign affairs, the consular and diplomatic service, including appropriations therefor, together with the accompanying correspondence and documents, the revision of treaties, and the enlargement of extradition treaties be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That so much as relates to the appropriation of the public revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided, namely, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, for fortifications and coast defenses, for pensions, for the District of Columbia, and for all deficiencies, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, and the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That so much as relates to banks and banking and currency be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

That so much as relates to the mints of the United States and to the coinage of gold and silver bullion be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

That so much as relates to the commerce of the United States, domestic and foreign, intercolonial railways, and to the Nicaragua Canal be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

That so much as relates to rivers and harbors and their improvement be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

That so much as relates to the merchant marine and fisheries and to tonnage dues be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

That so much as relates to agriculture and forestry, to the destruction and eradication of diseases of domestic animals, and to the inspection of cattle and pork products intended for shipment to foreign countries be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

That so much as relates to the military establishment be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much as relates to the naval establishment and to the construction of additional vessels for the Navy be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much as relates to the post-offices and post-roads and to the carrying of the foreign mails be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public domain be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the relations of the United States with the Indian tribes be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

That so much as relates to the Territories be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

That so much as relates to the protection of life on railways be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

That so much as relates to the manufacturing industries of the United States be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

That so much as relates to mines and mining be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

That so much as relates to public buildings and grounds be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

That so much as relates to the Pacific railroads be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

That so much as relates to levees and improvements of the Mississippi River be referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

That so much as relates to education be referred to the Committee on Education.

That so much as relates to labor be referred to the Committee on Labor.

That so much as relates to the militia of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

That so much as relates to patents be referred to the Committee on Patents.

That so much as relates to pensions for service in the civil war be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

That so much as relates to the District of Columbia, other than appropriations therefor, be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

That so much as relates to the civil service be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to quarantine regulations and foreign immigration be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and of the House to the fact that the resolution as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means sends all matters relating to the Nicaragua Canal to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I would suggest to the House that that is not a proper reference. After a canal is once built its control and all legislation affecting it would go to that committee, but until it is built it would go, under the rules, to the Committee on Railways and Canals, or else there is no necessity for the existence of that committee at all. It would have nothing to do, it would have no jurisdiction of any kind, if it had not the consideration of such propositions. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he permit that modification to be made.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have simply to say in response to the gentleman from Iowa that in that respect we have followed the action of the last Congress. It is true, as said by the gentleman, that strictly speaking the Nicaragua Canal matters might be said to belong to the Committee on Railways and Canals; but the committee did not have its attention called to the subject——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Has not the phraseology of the rule been changed in regard to the jurisdiction to the Committee on Commerce, so as to make it embrace foreign commerce as well as domestic?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the jurisdiction of the Committee on Railways and Canals has always been confined to canals constructed within the limits of the United States. It has no jurisdiction over foreign matters. The gentleman from Iowa is entirely mistaken in supposing that that committee would have jurisdiction, or could possibly have it, over this subject. The matter in question belongs to the Committee on Commerce, and can belong to no other committee, and the precedents are all in harmony with the suggestion I make.

The SPEAKER. Bills relating to the Nicaragua Canal have heretofore been referred by the Chair to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LACEY. I know it has been done, there having been no question presented to the Chair upon it. But I now call attention to the fact and ask that this matter be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply stated that as a matter of fact, the question not having been discussed heretofore.

Mr. LACEY. That committee, it seems to me, was organized especially to have jurisdiction of the construction of any railway or canal that is to be constructed under the direction or by the assistance of the United States, and the location of the canal, whether in Nicaragua or anywhere else, or whether in the United States or outside its limits, is immaterial.

But to bring the matter to the attention of the House, I move to strike out so much of the resolution reported by the Committee on Ways and Means as refers the Nicaragua Canal matter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and move its reference to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit his resolution in writing.

The proposed amendment was read by the Clerk.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the resolution be acted upon, and that this portion to which the amendment is offered be permitted to stand over until the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals is present, so that it may be considered in his presence. Let the balance of the reference be without prejudice.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LACEY) there were—ayes 8, noes 80.

Mr. LACEY. No quorum.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope, in view of the decided expression of sentiment in the House, that my friend from Iowa will withdraw his point of no quorum.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to have the resolution withdrawn, and let the whole matter stand over by unanimous consent until Mr. CHICKERING returns. It is only a matter of justice to him that this should be done. I am not disposed to be captious, but I think the chairman of the committee ought to be here.

Mr. HEPBURN and others. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on the yeas and nays, demanded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, at the instance of gentlemen around me, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

The original resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual resolution in reference to printing matter for use by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

SOUTH PLATTE AND PLUM CREEK FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution; and before objection is made I desire consent to make a brief statement.

The resolution was read at length. It provides that the South Platte and Plum Creek forest reserves, in Colorado, be opened to the location of mining claims.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state concerning these reservations that they were never intended to be for the use of the United States Government itself. They were set aside for the preservation of timber, so that the snows in the mountains should not melt until midsummer, so that a copious supply of water would be assured for the irrigation of the lands in the valleys and on the plains below. The bills for the setting apart of these reservations did not except mining, although they should have done so; and there is a unanimous sentiment in our State that these reservations should be opened to the location of mining claims thereon. There have been some very important gold discoveries made on these reservations, and the people in that vicinity are flocking upon them, and they ought to have the right to perfect title to these claims. I do not think there should be any objection to this resolution, as I have submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and also to one or two other members that I could find. They seem to have no objection to the same. I therefore ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask my colleague on the committee whether——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to appear ungracious, but the gentleman on this side who was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the last Congress [Mr. MCRAE], who is familiar with these questions, is absent, and to most of us the public-land laws and public-land questions are a sealed book, no matter how long we have served. We hardly think it just and proper that matters of importance like this should be determined without the examination of a committee and without some expression from the head of the Department. This has not been referred, I think, to the Interior Department. The gentleman spoke to me about it, and when I asked him he said there had been no reference of it to that Department. We hardly think that is fair, so that I shall have to object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the gentleman, if he will permit me——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope he will not insist.

CLERICAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a Senate concurrent resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, authorized to employ such clerical aid as he may find necessary in the copying, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, of the messages of the Presidents of the United States from the Journals of the Senate and House and the Executive Journals for the printing thereof, and that the expense therefor, not to exceed $600, be paid out of the appropriation for public printing and binding.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will make a statement which will require only a moment. The last Congress directed the Joint Committee on Printing to have printed all the annual, veto, and special messages, inaugural addresses, and proclamations of the Presidents of the United States from 1789 down to date. There is no appropriation for it, except that it be done by the Public Printer out of the appropriation for printing and binding. There is no money the joint committee can use in having the work done.

That committee met and considered this resolution. They knew that it would be an exceedingly valuable compilation, as the Government has never made any such publication. The committee hesitated for some time, as they had no authority to employ any one to do the work, however great the desire to do it. But, to make a long story short, they finally, with my consent, put the labor on myself. I will state that in the effort to do the work put upon me I have compiled enough to make about two volumes, having spent three or four months of hard labor upon it.

In carrying out the order, I found it necessary to have printed certain Executive messages which are not printed in Senate and House Journals, but in what is called the Executive Journal. Of that there are only a few copies in existence. One copy is in the hands of the Clerk of the Senate, who will not permit it to go to the Printing Office in order that the messages therein may be copied and printed. The printers could not very well set up the matter from this Journal anyway, and therefore it becomes necessary that there shall be some clerical work done in the copying of these messages. This resolution does not make any appropriation. It simply directs the Public Printer to do what he possibly has a right to do anyway in carrying out the order to have the work printed. It simply authorizes him to make use of the appropriation already made for public printing and binding, to such an extent as may be necessary in the compensation of two or three copyists to copy these messages. It does not require any new appropriation, but limits it to $600.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is it limited in the resolution? I was just going to ask the gentleman the estimated cost.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It will probably not exceed three or four hundred dollars, but the limit is fixed in the resolution at $600. The work is being delayed, and I want to advance it as rapidly as possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I send forward a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2 be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents, for the use of said committee, as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I raise this question, that under the law neither House can authorize printing to an amount exceeding $500; and inasmuch as the Committee on Elections is now divided into three, or three subcommittees, as they may be termed, the printing authorized by the Committee on Elections could not exceed $500, or $166.66⅔ for each committee; and I doubt, therefore, whether a House resolution would cover the purpose of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me, the view I take of the matter is that the original Committee on Elections has gone, that there are now three Committees on Elections, and that each committee would be entitled to expend $500 in printing. I do not, of course, know what the understanding of the other gentlemen, chairmen of the Committees on Elections, may be, but if this resolution pass I should deem it within my right to order that amount of printing. At the same time I would restrict the printing ordered to the lowest possible amount for the proper performance of the duties of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object, because if it amounted to more than $500 I do not think it could be had under this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It would require a joint resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

CONGRATULATIONS OF BRAZILIAN CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair will lay before the House, although it has reached the Chair in a somewhat irregular form, the following telegram.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Received at Washington, D. C., December 21, 1895.]

PRESIDENT CHAMBER OF THE REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C.:

The Chamber of Deputies of the Republic of the United States of Brazil congratulates the Chamber of the Representatives of the North American Union for President Cleveland's worthy message, which so nobly and highly defends the rights and liberty of the American nations consecrated in Monroe's principles.

ROSA E. SILVA, Presidente.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, December 26, at 12 m.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BAILEY (by request): A bill (H. R. 2697) to amend section 31 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 2, 1890—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MURPHY of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 2698) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River to the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, from some suitable point between the north line of St. Clair County, Ill., and the southwest line of said county—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McCLELLAN: A bill (H. R. 2699) to secure a uniform bank-note circulation and to provide for the redemption thereof—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 2700) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue arms to National Guards—to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. SHUFORD: A bill (H. R. 2701) to repeal joint resolution No. 21, March 3, 1893, authorizing the employment of clerks by Members and Delegates in Congress—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. BEACH: A bill (H. R. 2702) providing for the reciprocal interchange of products between the United States and other nations—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2703) authorizing the President of the United States to call an international conference—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 2704) for the erection of a public building at Green Bay, Wis.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2705) constituting Green Bay, in Wisconsin, a port of delivery—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 2706) to grant to the city of Charleston, S. C., the old post-office lot and building for the use of the commercial bodies of the city—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. TRACY: A bill (H. R. 2707) to prevent the stopping or reduction of pensions without an investigation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COOPER of Texas: A bill (H. R. 2708) to constitute a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for the holding of terms of court at Beaumont, Tex., and for the appointment of a clerk for said court—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2709) to establish a customs collection district at Sabine Pass, Tex.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HENRY of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 2710) to provide for the erection of a public building at Indianapolis, Ind.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CURTIS of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 2711) for the construction of a public building at Clinton, Iowa—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 2712) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GIBSON: A bill (H. R. 2713) to increase the pensions of all helpless soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2714) to grant a pension to all Union soldiers and sailors in certain cases—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PRICE: A bill (H. R. 2715) to supply public revenues—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McCLELLAN: A bill (H. R. 2716) relating to the retired officers of the Army or Navy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BLUE: A bill (H. R. 2717) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg, or been totally disabled therein, while in the service—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENDRICK: A bill (H. R. 2718) for the erection of a public building at Mayfield, Ky.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CANNON of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 2719) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Joliet, in the State of Illinois—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WOOD: Petition to pension George W. Dewald—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 26, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under Rule XXIV, clause 2, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 404) granting a pension to Samuel Goldwater; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A bill (S. 480) granting a pension to William B. Matchett; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army and Navy of the United States; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

REVENUE BILL.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. 2749) "to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency."

The SPEAKER. The bill and report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CRISP. I understood the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to make a report from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The report has been made and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRISP. In explanation of the fact that the views of the minority are not presented on this occasion, I desire to say that we have had no opportunity of preparing a statement of our views, because at fifteen minutes before 12 o'clock to-day we saw for the first time the views of the majority in regard to this measure. I make this statement, Mr. Speaker, in justification of the minority. On yesterday, Christmas Day, we were called to meet with the other members of the Committee on Ways and Means, and were then shown the bill which has just been reported by the gentleman from Maine. Then, for the first time, we saw that bill, a measure affecting every one of the tariff schedules. We asked for time to submit the bill to the Treasury Department and obtain estimates as to its probable effect upon the revenue. That was refused. We asked the gentlemen of the majority if they had any estimates upon which they had based this bill—any expert testimony—and we were informed that they had not. We then asked for a reasonable time to prepare the views of the minority, and that was refused. So the minority desire the House to understand the course that has been pursued by the majority in respect to this matter and to understand that the views of the minority are not presented now only because we have not been accorded that courtesy which is usually extended to minorities of committees in cases of this character.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the resolution which I send to the desk as a substitute for one introduced by me on Monday, December 23, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order in the House to call up for debate, the previous question being considered as ordered, a bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, entitled "A bill to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency;" that at 5 o'clock, without delay or other motion, the vote shall be taken. General leave to print is hereby granted for ten days.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The question being taken, the previous question was ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is not going to make an explanation of this rule.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is my purpose to do so. The effect of the adoption of this rule is to permit debate upon the bill just reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for raising revenue, the debate to continue until 5 o'clock to-day, when a vote is to be taken upon the bill. I refer to the bill changing the tariff rates in some particulars, for members of the House will understand, I think, that another proposition will be brought in later. That other bill, however, will not be brought up until to-morrow, so that this day until 5 o'clock will be devoted entirely to the discussion of this tariff bill. The provisions of the bill we will not now stop to discuss. The discussion of them will come on when the forty minutes allowed for debate upon this rule are exhausted. I may say this, however, at the present time that the bill is in no sense a general revision of the tariff law, but is legislation designed to promptly and efficiently provide sufficient revenue for carrying on the Government. The Chief Executive of the nation has by a special message called our attention to the financial condition of the country. He has sent us two messages, in fact, which have produced a high degree of excitement throughout the country, and we are given to understand that the business centers are staggering under the weight of the consternation that has followed what I may call two feverish declarations from the White House. The object of the bill just reported to the House is to exercise the judgment of Congress, to which the President referred the subject of his message. The President has stated the conditions as he sees them, and has referred them for action to the wisdom of Congress. The Executive and the majority of the members of this House may perhaps differ as to the causes and the nature of these troubles, but these bills are designed to meet the existing difficulties as the majority of the House see them. With this brief explanation I reserve the balance of my time until we hear from the other side.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. Culberson appeared at the bar of the House and the oath of office was administered to him by the Speaker.

REVENUE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is recognized to control twenty minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the House for a few moments in order that members may know exactly what the pending proposition is. Of course each Representative should vote in accordance with his own sense of propriety, but before he casts his vote he ought to know the effect of it. He ought not to blindly follow others who prescribe a rule for him, but he ought to follow the dictates of his own conscience, ascertain what the rule is, and determine whether he approves or disapproves it.

This rule relates to a tariff bill—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] says not a general, but a temporary bill. Sir, a bill may be general although temporary. This is a general tariff bill that affects all the schedules on the list. As to some it prescribes a specific rate of duty; as to others it prescribes a horizontal increase. Now, under the rules of the House (and I refer to those rules because there are many members here who are not yet acquainted with the rules)—under the rules adopted by this body "all motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people shall have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole." The special rule now reported deprives the House of that right. In Committee of the Whole a bill is first read for debate under what is called the hour rule. This proposition deprives the House of that right. In Committee of the Whole a bill, after debate under the hour rule, is considered under what is known as the five-minute rule, when amendments are in order. This special rule deprives the House of that right. So that every single right which was intended to be reserved to the representatives of the people by the rules established under the Constitution of our country is taken away by this special rule now reported from the Committee on Rules.

Do gentlemen understand that if this rule be adopted no amendment will be in order? What authority is it that is so powerful, so omnipotent on the Republican side of the House that it can say to you, "Here is a general tariff bill affecting the interests of every district and community in the United States, and you must take it without the right to offer a single amendment"? You may disapprove some parts of it; it may injuriously affect interests in your locality; yet under the operation of the "machine"—under the crack of the party whip—you are not to be allowed to criticise it and you are not to be allowed to offer an amendment to it, but you are to be required on your fealty to your party to vote not only to pass it, but to pass it without any sort of consideration.

We hear a great deal said about the justice of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. We on this side have never complained so much of those rules as we have of the practices under them. Here we find a return, a prompt return, to the practices of the Fifty-first Congress. I could point you—I have no doubt our friends on the other side will do so—to some cases since the Fifty-first Congress where the Committee on Rules have presented a report providing for the consideration of a bill and limiting it to a very short period of time for consideration. But I defy any gentleman to point to any rule reported by any committee of any Congress heretofore in the history of the country whereby a general tariff bill was to be disposed of in the House of the people's representatives in about four hours, without the right to offer a single amendment.

The Constitution of the United States declares that this House shall originate measures of taxation. A committee of this House has originated a measure of taxation. The body of this House has not been consulted or conferred with respecting it. It is brought into this House; and you are told that you must vote for it just as it is, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." And that is what you call Republican methods. That is Republican independence of thought and idea. All individual judgment is to be subordinated; and those who crack the party whip on the other side are to be obediently and respectfully followed. You are to be chained to their chariot and to follow wherever they lead.

Now, this is the very first opportunity we have had to see what is the composition of that side of the House. Here is a great question. There is no necessity for this bill. This bill is not demanded by any Department of the Government. There is no suggestion from any source that there is an insufficiency of revenue. Yet, under whip and spur, without giving members of the Committee on Ways and Means, as I have said, an opportunity even to send this bill to the Treasury Department and invite the judgment of an expert as to its effects, it is to be driven through. You are required to vote yea or nay. You are required to take it or reject it, depriving yourselves by the adoption of this special rule of that ancient right that has always existed since Congress existed, the right of the people's representatives to consider and offer amendments, to have them voted upon, to know the effect of the bill when passed. All those things are taken away from you by the adoption of the present resolution. It remains to be seen whether the other side of the House will in this way, as a body, surrender their independence and their manhood as Representatives.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has sixteen minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] twelve.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no gentleman within the sound of my voice who does not know that we face to-day as a people a peculiar exigency. Since the 4th day of March, 1893, when the Democratic party came into power, we have been issuing bonds, borrowing money, and day by day, month by month, year by year, our revenues have been showing a greater and greater deficiency. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury have both become alarmed. The President of the United States, appealing to a party that is not his own in the House of Representatives, has asked them with all the solemnity that pertains to his high office to come to his aid. He has said: "Gentlemen, will you not forego the pleasures even of a holiday season and address yourselves to legislation that shall aid the Government?" Under these circumstances, in this most extraordinary emergency, the Committee on Ways and Means have addressed themselves for the last three or four days, and I may say nights, to the solution of the problem—to ascertaining the best solution possible under the circumstances.

I agree with my friend from Georgia that a tariff bill, if it were now presented in the first instance as a new one, ought to be considered and prepared with great care and proper deliberation, after due hearings upon the various schedules. But the gentleman knows, as every member of the House knows, that if the House responds at all to the Executive call, it must respond immediately, and must content itself with such deliberation only as is possible under the existing circumstances. But this is not a tariff bill; it is not a revision of the tariff at all, in any general sense of the word. It is not an attempt to correct the many manifest absurdities, incongruities, and injustices of existing law. It is merely an emergency revenue measure, intended to bring relief to the suffering Treasury of the country.

The gentleman from Georgia says that we are to be driven into the support of this measure to-day under the party whip. It is refreshing to hear from the gentleman from Georgia about the "party whip" and "ironclad rules." [Laughter on the Republican side.] Is his memory so short that he forgets the act which I hold in my hand, with over 600 amendments, not one of which was ever considered by this House, and which was passed through the House with but two hours' debate pursuant to a rule framed by the gentleman from Georgia himself? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Does the gentleman from Georgia forget that, in violation of all precedents and of parliamentary decency, bills were introduced in this House, and, without reference to any committee, passed under a rule framed by the gentleman from Georgia with but fifteen minutes' debate on each side? Does he forget that a bill which dealt with the great coal interests of this country, a bill that dealt with the great sugar interests of this country, and a bill that dealt with the ore interests of this country, each and every one of them never deliberated upon in the Committee on Ways and Means at all, were presented in open House and passed in thirty minutes under a gag prepared by the gentleman from Georgia himself? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Is it not refreshing?

Now, gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, what are we called on to do? You are called on to-day to answer, as best you can, and to answer under the circumstances existing, the request of the President of the United States. It is not in answer to the party whip; but rising, as the Republican party always rises, above the plane of party consideration or party prejudices to the high level of patriotic purpose, we propose to afford to the President of the United States and to the Treasury of the country the relief that he has asked. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall wish to occupy only one-half of the time, as I desire my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. TURNER of Georgia] to occupy a portion of it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has very appropriately asked what this House is called upon to do. And I will give the answer that he failed to give. You are called upon to pass upon a general tariff bill to-day without the right to amend; a bill which affects every item on the dutiable list, I believe, in the tariff schedules, except sugar, amounting to more than 4,000 in number, and you are asked to come blindly up and cross your hands and let the gentleman from Maine and his colleagues tie you hand and foot, hard and fast, and surrender your right even to present an amendment to the bill. You are called upon to take such a course in connection with this bill as has never been taken in connection with any revision of the tariff in the history of the House of Representatives since the organization of the Government.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania attempts to confound the action taken by the House on the Senate bill in the last Congress in connection with the Wilson bill, and to offer that as a comparison to this proposed rule. But the gentleman fails to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that on that bill we had elaborate hearings in the Committee on Ways and Means, where he had a right to bring his friends. We had ample arguments and ample opportunities for hearings before that committee. He should also remember that after the time that bill had been agreed upon an opportunity was given to him and his colleagues to present and have considered the views of the minority. But how different is it here. Yesterday, a holiday, when the Departments of the Government were closed, when the Treasury was closed, when even the Library of this Capitol was closed, and no man had an opportunity to get the bill proposed by the gentleman from Maine, that measure was brought in to the Committee on Ways and Means, never having been introduced in the House at all, never having been considered, was never read before the Committee on Ways and Means, and even amended materially after it was brought there, and in thirty short minutes we are asked to take and swallow it whole, without even an opportunity for amendment!

They announce to us that no time will be given for the consideration of the different schedules; that no time will be given to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to know whether or not this measure is needed. No time will be given to call upon him to know whether he needs the revenue; but they come in here this morning, when the bill has never been read here, and when not ten men on this floor understand fully its provisions, and ask you on that side to surrender your right even to offer amendments. Ah, Mr. Speaker, when Esau surrendered his birthright and his heritage for a mess of pottage he at least had hunger as a pitiful excuse. These gentlemen have not even their Christmas turkeys in front of them as an excuse for their peculiar manner in dealing with this measure and their surrender of their rights. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] When they get it into the House they propose to impose $44,000,000 of taxes on more than 4,000 different articles in less than four hours, or $11,000,000 an hour. They announce to us that they have seized the reins again; that they are going to drive the old chaise of state over the same old track to the same destructive terminus again. Go ahead, gentlemen. There was a power that checked you once before. There is a power which will check you again—the masses of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. CRISP. Unless the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] desires to use all his time in conclusion, will he let some one on that side address the House, and then this side will follow?

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to conclude the debate, Mr. Speaker. How much time has the gentleman from Georgia remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. CRISP. How much time has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has eleven minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Georgia will please conclude his time.

Mr. CRISP. I yield that time, Mr. Speaker, to my colleague [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is idle, perhaps, on this occasion to indulge in epithets. Perhaps it would be unprofitable to make comparisons. But it may not be amiss to ask gentlemen to pause and consider the situation.

The President on Friday morning sent to Congress a message informing us of the gravity of the financial situation. In his annual message he had suggested the remedy which to him seemed wisest, and our able Secretary of the Treasury—as able as ever occupied that high position since the days of Alexander Hamilton—had given to Congress his frank and manly statement of our financial condition. In each of those great communications to Congress the assurance was not only given that the Treasury had ample funds to meet all its expenditures and all its ordinary demands, but that it had a surplus which would reach over two or three years; that above the gold reserve there was over seventy millions of dollars in the Treasury available for the current expenses of the Government. And, according to the very nature of the case, gentlemen on our side, the great party to which we belong, though momentarily in defeat, have believed during all the agonizing experience of the last two or three years that it was not a question of revenue, but that it was a question which struck higher and concerned our entire financial policy. And when the President and the Secretary recommended to Congress the consideration of that view, aye, sir, when they asked for bread, you give them a stone. When they ask you to relieve the stress on the Treasury, that particular stress which every man understands and appreciates, you reply by putting in front of all your remedial legislation the proposition to still further bleed and tax the American people.

And, Mr. Speaker, let gentlemen remember that this is done with the most extraordinary haste ever known in the history of the American Congress. This bill, although laid on our desks as a print of the House of Representatives, could not have been printed and sent here since this bill was introduced a few moments ago. Neither could this report of the Committee on Rules have been presented here on the basis, as it says, of a bill reported to the House, because the Committee on Rules have had no meeting since this bill was submitted to the House. The bill has not been printed in the orderly course. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means has not been printed in the orderly course, as my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], has shown. The report of the Committee on Rules has not been presented in the orderly course, and coming to the rule itself, I say that it is unprecedented and unheard of that a rule should be offered contemplating a general revision of our entire tax system without the power of the people's representatives to be heard even in the five-minute debate. Here is a proposition to tax the American people $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, more or less, in one broad sweep of protection, and yet we have scarcely time for the members of the Committee on Ways and Means to enter their protest against it. They have had no time to formulate and embody their views in a minority report, and if we, on this side, are heard at all in opposition to this measure, it will be in such brief and limited speeches as we can make by voluntary arrangement among ourselves within about two hours or two hours and a half.

Reference has been made here, Mr. Speaker, to what took place at the heel of the last Congress. Gentlemen who were members of that House understand fully the condition which then prevailed.

The House had sent to the Senate a bill embodying the view of my party. The Senate put upon that bill a great number of amendments, and with reference to their course upon it I dare not offer my sentiments in stricture. I can not do that without violating parliamentary proprieties. After two or three months' consideration of the bill in the Senate it went to a committee of conference, and was there considered for two months; and, as a last resort, in order to get a measure in some form of the nature we desired upon the statute books, it went through the House in some such way as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has stated. Then, after the question of coal had been discussed through weeks and months, incidentally, in both Houses; after the sugar question had been considered in both Houses; and after the ore question had been debated for a long and almost indefinite time in both Houses, then, in the closing hours of the session, when there was no hope or opportunity for consideration and deliberation, we passed those measures to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred. Ours is not now that situation. We are at the very beginning of the session, or at the opening of a Congress of which the friends of the gentleman have the majority. Why is it that they do not give us an opportunity for the discussion of this great question? If they are actuated by any spirit of deference to the department of Government which now holds our fortunes in its hands, why do not they put some other measure in front instead of seeking in this Christmas time to tax the American people to the amount of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000—an imposition against which the Treasury itself protests?

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has one-half minute left.

Mr. CRISP. I reserve that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the half minute reserved?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia claims to reserve a half a minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a business matter, for a business people, and should be met in a business way. A few days ago, when this House was considering the Bayard resolution, we were taunted by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that we dared not take responsibility. We will show him to-day whether the Republican party is afraid to take responsibility or not. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Whether this country is presided over by a Republican or a Democratic Executive, whether it is threatened with bullets or ballots, whether by deficiency or surplus, the Republican party never shirks its duty to this country. [Renewed applause.] We are taunted with working on a holiday. I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that if the Democratic ass falls into the ditch with a national load upon its shoulders we will even work on Sunday to take the national part of it out of the ditch. [Laughter and great applause.]

The gentleman from Georgia tells us that this is for the purpose of taxing the people. My God, there is no power in Congress to put back in the pockets of the American people that which Democratic policies have robbed them of since the Democratic Administration went into power on the 4th of March, 189[illegible] [Renewed applause.] They talk of speed in behalf of the Treasury. Do they forget the speed with which Democratic policies have emptied the Treasury? [Laughter.] They have emptied it, and we propose to put money there. Since this Administration came into power it has kept this nation oscillating between chills and fever. [Laughter.] We propose to stop these diseases and let the American regain a normal condition. We will do our part of it.

Talk about war; as one Democratic statesman said, the President comes in here one day and makes a declaration of war, and in three days afterwards files his petition in bankruptcy. [Laughter.] We are not for war. The Republican party is against war. It has made no declaration in this House for war. Let the country take observation of that. True, the President demanded money to carry out his constitutional functions, and the Republican party said it would supply him with the money; but we have not declared for war. If war becomes necessary the Republican party will be ready; but we have not yet exercised the judgment of the Republican party on that question. Let not the business interests of this country run before this "tempest in a teapot." This country is solvent. It has the assets; it has the integrity. Give to a nation assets and integrity and the business interests of the nation need not be afraid. We have returned to power here, and we will look after the solvency of the nation, and never again will the American people find our integrity put in question.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to reserve one minute of my time, and I ask the Speaker to keep his eye on me, so that I will not run over it. [Laughter.]

Now, the claim has been made in debate just now that the Wilson bill had been considered here in the late Congress, and that ample opportunity had been given to consider it. After the House bill went over to the Senate it came back so completely covered with patches that the original pantaloons could not be recognized by Mr. Wilson himself, and these amendments we never had opportunity to examine and pass upon. When you consider that on the final home stretch in that great tariff discussion and legislation the gag was put upon this House, that all the declarations of Jefferson's Manual and other authorities on rules were overturned by a single rule emanating from the committee of which my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was chairman, and that it was lashed through this House without chance of amendment, does it lie in the voices of those gentlemen to complain now about "whip and spur" and "the gag"?

The statement is made that the Secretary of the Treasury says there is plenty of revenue. Mr. Speaker, that is not true. I join issue with that statement, but will leave the discussion of it for the proper time, after this rule shall have been adopted. Then we will demonstrate that the Treasury has not sufficient funds. Then we will demonstrate, by proofs that can not be refuted, that this country is suffering for want of revenue to pay its legitimate expenses. Greenbacks and gold are being taken out of the Treasury to pay current expenses; yet the gentleman from Georgia last on his feet [Mr. TURNER] dares to sustain the statement of the Treasury Department that we have sufficient revenue.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, this is a business matter. The pending bill is not a general tariff measure. It represents neither the aggregate judgment of the Republican side nor of the Democratic side on the tariff question, but the President of the United States has laid before us the condition of the Treasury and the business interests of the country.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at this moment. The business interests of the country say that financially we are in a crippled condition. Now, we all know that if we were to go into a general revision of the tariff every member would feel bound to investigate details and to stand up for his local interests. That has been done by both sides of the Chamber whenever there has been a general revision. To enter upon such a course now would be to tie our hands for months, and that would bring about a crisis in this country compared with which the Democratic crash of 1893 was a holiday entertainment. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LINNEY. As a Republican I am with the gentleman, of course, in this matter; but under the rule as it now stands, can we not extend to our Democratic brethren the opportunity of offering amendments, and then, under the operation of the previous question, pass the bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, that can not be done. It is not best in the opinion of the committee.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, our friend on my left [Mr. LINNEY] is not so new a member that he has not discovered the kernel of this controversy. [Laughter.] This rule is brought in not only for the purpose of preventing this side of the House from offering amendments, but to prevent gentlemen on the Republican side from voting for amendments. It is not necessary that you should tie us up by this rule, because, if you all agree to this bill, you have a majority far more than sufficient to vote down every amendment that we might offer. The purpose of the rule, Mr. Speaker, is to prevent any gentleman on your own side from voting for any amendment which he might conceive to be in the interest of his constituents. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the real object of this rule. It is designed not only to gag us, but also to gag gentlemen on the Republican side who might be disposed to rebel against the party whip which is being applied in this summary manner.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia wholly misconstrues my statement. It was upon the ground of want of time alone that I called attention to the fact that differences are dangerous in dealing with this subject. As to Democratic amendments, of course we would vote them down, for no Democratic tariff proposition would justify any patriot in voting for it. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 208, nays 90, not voting 57; as follows:

Mr. WILBER with Mr. OGDEN.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I should like to have my vote recorded in the negative.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and did he fail to hear his name called?

Mr. WASHINGTON. I was not in my seat. I was called out and did not get back in time to vote.

The SPEAKER. Under those circumstances the Chair can not ask consent that the gentleman's vote be recorded.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If permitted to do so I should vote "no."

Mr. TERRY read a telegram stating that his colleague, Mr. MCRAE, was detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill referred to in the order just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act, and until August 1, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all imported wools of classes 1 and 2, as defined in the act hereinafter cited, approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations thereof, and on all hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, except as hereinafter provided, and on all noils, shoddy, garnetted waste, top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, and all other wastes composed wholly or in part of wool, and on woolen rags, mungo, and flocks, a duty equivalent to 60 per cent of the duty imposed on each of such articles by an act entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations of said act; and on all wools and Russian camel's hair of class 3, as defined in said act approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations thereof, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the several duties provided by such act approved October 1, 1890. And paragraph 279 of Schedule K, and also paragraph 685 in the free list of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August 27, 1894, are hereby suspended until August 1, 1898.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act and until August 1, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all imported articles made in whole or in part of wool, worsted, or other materials described in section 1 of this act, except as hereinafter provided, 60 per cent of the specific pound or square-yard duty imposed on each of such articles by an act entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations thereof, in addition to the ad valorem duty now imposed on each of such articles by an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August 27, 1894; and on carpets, druggets, bockings, mats, rugs, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting, made in whole or in part of wool, the specific square-yard duty imposed on each of such articles by said act approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations thereof, in addition to the ad valorem duty imposed on such articles by said act which became a law August 27, 1894.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act and until August 1, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all imported lumber and other articles designated in paragraphs 674 to 683, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August 27, 1894, a duty equivalent to 60 per cent of the duty imposed on each of such articles by an act entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other porposes," approved October 1, 1890, and subject to all the conditions and limitations of said last-named act; but pulp wood shall be classed as round unmanufactured timber exempt from duty: Provided, That in case any foreign country shall impose an export duty upon pine, spruce, elm, or other logs, or upon stave bolts, shingle wood, pulp wood, or heading blocks exported to the United States from such country, then the duty upon the lumber and other articles mentioned in said paragraphs 674 to 683, inclusive, when imported from such country, shall be the same as fixed by the law in force prior to October 1, 1890.

SEC. 4. That on and after the passage of this act, and until August 1, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all the imported articles mentioned in Schedules A, B, C, D, F, G, H, I, J, L, M, and N, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August 27, 1894, a duty equivalent to 15 per cent of the duty imposed on each of said articles by existing law in addition to the duty provided by said act of August 27, 1894: Provided, That the additional duties imposed by this section shall not in any case increase the rate of duty on any article beyond the rate imposed thereon by the said act of October 1, 1890, but in such case the duty shall be the same as was imposed by said act: And provided further, That where the present rate of duty on any article is higher than was fixed by said last-named act, the rate of duty thereon shall not be further increased by this section, but shall remain as provided by existing law.

The SPEAKER. The debate on this question will be limited to three hours and a half, which will give to each side an hour and three-quarters. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to control the time on one side, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to control the time on the other. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, when there was read at the Clerk's desk on Saturday last a special message from the President of the United States informing Congress that there existed a serious condition of the finances of the country and of the Federal Treasury requiring immediate relief, and appealing to the Senate and House to take no recess until relief should be afforded, every member of this House, I take it, felt that there was imposed upon us a special responsibility—not only a special responsibility, but also that there existed an urgent demand for immediate relief on the highest patriotic grounds. So thoroughly did the Committee on Ways and Means feel the urgency of this appeal that it was unanimously decided without distinction of party that it was the duty of this House to remain in session, omitting the usual recess for the time being, until there should be some measure or measures of legislation passed that would afford relief to the exigent condition of the Federal Treasury.

The Committee on Ways and Means immediately took up the subject and proceeded to consider what measures of relief could be proposed. The first thing that attracted the attention of the committee—the first in order because the most important and lying in large measure at the very foundation of the difficulties through which the Treasury had passed—was the fact that for two years and a half there has been a constant deficiency of revenue—an insufficiency of current income to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government—until that condition has become chronic.

Gentlemen have said in the debate upon the rule which was presented that there is no demand for more revenue, that the revenue is sufficient. I remember that in the last House, almost a year ago, when I presented upon this floor what seemed to me the urgent demand for an increase of revenue, it was replied by gentlemen on the other side that "next week," "next month," there would be revenue sufficient. And so we have gone on with this cry of hope all through this year up to this hour; and almost every month from the 1st day of July, 1893, up to to-day there has been an insufficiency of revenue to meet the current expenditures of the Government, amounting now to the enormous sum of $132,000,000. And in the present fiscal year, commencing on the 1st day of July last, up to night before last, there was, as shown by the official report in my hand, a deficiency of eighteen and a half million dollars; and in this very month of December, as shown in the same way, there has been a deficiency approximating $3,000,000.

Now, gentlemen tell us that there is revenue enough to meet the expenditures of the Government. What do they mean? What does the Secretary of the Treasury mean when he says that we need no more revenue? What did he mean one year ago when he communicated to one of the Houses of Congress that there was no need of additional revenue? His own reports presented from day to day show that there has been a deficiency all through this fiscal year, and never larger than at this moment. He means simply this (and I ask the attention of the House to the manner in which this issue is being avoided, for I wish to show the evil results which flow from it)—he means that after he has borrowed gold under the resumption act of 1875 for the purpose of redeeming United States legal-tender notes as they are presented for redemption, and after those notes have been thus redeemed by the proceeds of bonds sold, he has taken the very United States notes thus redeemed and immediately paid them out to meet a deficiency of revenue from day to day, from month to month, and from year to year. I ask, gentlemen, if so plain and practical a matter as this is to be met in this manner, what difference does it make if the Secretary of the Treasury sells bonds and immediately uses the proceeds to pay a deficiency in the revenue, or, having first used the proceeds of the bonds to redeem greenbacks, then to turn around and use the greenbacks to pay the necessary expenses of the Government and meet the deficiencies of the revenue? I ask gentlemen to point out the difference. Is not this in effect practically selling bonds to pay the deficiency?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this policy is to be pursued, if we are to go on with insufficient revenues to meet the expenses of the Government, and then when bonds are sold for gold to redeem outstanding legal-tender notes those notes are to be immediately used to pay deficiencies of revenues, then I say to you that the "endless chain" of which the Secretary of the Treasury complains is fully established, and he may continue selling bonds without limit to put gold into the Treasury, taking the greenbacks to pay the deficiency in revenue, and never stop the raids upon the Treasury gold. Is there any doubt of this? Can it be questioned? And yet gentlemen say to us that because we have to-day $75,000,000 of cash above the redemption fund in the Treasury—$25,000,000 being required for a working balance, leaving $50,000,000 of free United States notes—gentlemen tell us that we may proceed to use those notes to meet a deficiency in the Treasury, placing the notes so that they may be presently presented for a second redemption in gold, and still need no more revenue. Is there any doubt that if we are to stop this run on the Treasury, to stop the issue of bonds to be sold for gold to maintain the redemption fund, that the first thing in order, the first step, is to provide sufficient revenue to meet the daily and monthly and yearly expenses of the Government? It is admitted that we do not have sufficient revenue for these purposes, and that the deficiency must be made up by taking the redeemed notes and immediately paying them out again. This is practically using the proceeds of the bonds to meet the deficiency of revenues of the Government.

Now, how did it happen that from 1879 up to 1893 there was no serious run on the Treasury gold? We had the greenbacks existing during that period, and preferred everywhere to gold. But why? Because, in the first place, the revenues of the Government were equal to or greater than the expenditures; and there was no necessity for creating an "endless chain," which must exist as long as there is insufficient revenue; in the second place, because there was maintained a redemption fund up to the minimum of $100,000,000, which created confidence every day and every hour; and third, because there was existing such a policy in the country as put all the people at work, all the spindles turning, and all the machinery moving, while consumption was up to the highest point, and prosperity existing in all directions. These conditions have been set aside since 1893, and insufficiency of revenue is a potent cause of existing distrust.

As long as this condition exists I contend that you may continue to sell bonds to maintain the redemption fund indefinitely, and yet, unless you furnish sufficient revenue to carry on the Government without a deficit at the end of each month and each year, that you are making simply an endless chain which will sustain the run on the gold in the Treasury—a run inaugurated by distrust.

I contend, further, that the fact that the Government has for two years and a half had insufficient revenue to pay its expenses has cast a cloud over all the business of the country and is an important factor in creating the distrust prevailing everywhere.

Now, in view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, and it seems to the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the first thing to be done—and on that must depend the success of all measures of relief—is so to legislate as to provide sufficient revenues for the expenses of the Government. And believing this, appealed to by the President of the United States to furnish a remedy for the existing situation, and to furnish it at once, has excused and even made necessary what would otherwise seem to be something of haste. But when the country is in danger, when such a message as that sent to us on Saturday by the President of the United States is brought to our attention, it becomes the duty of this House, charged with the constitutional duty of inaugurating revenue measures, to provide such a measure at the earliest possible moment in view of the great urgency that exists.

The first duty, then, that confronts the House is to provide sufficient revenue to meet the expenditures. How much revenue is required? Up to the 1st of January, the close of the first half of this fiscal year, the deficit will reach nearly $20,000,000, and assuming that that condition will exist during the next six months, for it is hardly reasonable to suppose that there will not be a deficiency during that period, it will bring the total up to at least $30,000,000, probably $35,000,000, and this may be increased to a much larger sum in certain contingencies.

Now, the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, in view of this situation, have felt it to be their duty immediately—first in order because first in importance, upon which everything else depends—to provide about $40,000,000 of additional revenue annually during this exigency. We do not know how long this exigency may continue, but we believe that it is safe in any event to provide $40,000,000 additional revenue annually for two years and a half. Hence the measure which has been reported by the committee is limited in its operation to two years and a half, the additional revenue to begin on the passage of the bill which has been presented and to terminate on the 1st day of August, 1898. It is exigency legislation which we have presented. It is legislation demanded by the special condition of the Treasury, to which our attention has been called by the President of the United States. It is demanded in the interest of the people of the United States.

The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, in looking around to see where this revenue could be obtained, have agreed that it should be obtained from the customs side of our revenue system for two reasons: First, on the excise side we already raise over $150,000,000, which is all that should come from internal taxes. Second, it was always the intention of the founders of this Government to raise revenue for the support of the National Government from duties on imports. You well remember the position taken by the founder of the Democratic party, Thomas Jefferson, who raised the issue in 1800 against the Administration of John Adams because it had introduced excise taxes and introduced them because there was a threat of a war with France. Now, it has been the traditional policy of the old Democratic party, from its foundation even up to 1884—when in its national platform it adopted a resolution to the effect that the expenditures of the Federal Government should be raised exclusively from duties on imports—I say it has been the traditional policy of that party to have the Federal Treasury rest on duties on imports, and to leave all other forms of taxation to the several States.

We have held, therefore, that it was our duty, especially in view of the fact that the balance of trade during this fiscal year has turned against us—and having turned against us has created a demand for gold for export—to raise additional revenue by increasing duties at some points in order that we might thereby increase the volume of goods to be made in this country, incidentally, and at the same time diminish the imports of that class of goods, and thus turn the balance of trade in our favor, instead of against us. For it must be remembered that so long as the balance of trade is against us, gold must be exported to pay that balance, or else securities payable in gold, which are precisely the same thing.

Therefore it seemed to us that for these reasons we should look to the import side for the purpose of raising $40,000,000 additional revenue. Looking in that direction, with the urgent demand upon us for instant action, we have, of course, found it impossible to revise the tariff, especially upon our ground; and looking at the fact of the great necessity, we have decided, by the simplest possible measure, to raise $40,000,000, or thereabouts, of additional revenue and to stop this deficit that is causing such serious injury to the finances of the country. In raising revenue in this way we have been obliged to turn, in large part, to a horizontal increase of duty.

Now, I admit that under other conditions, when there was no urgency, this would be an improper way to modify the tariff for the purpose of obtaining more or less revenue. But there is no time to go through the tariff and to examine the condition of each industry and adapt legislation to the wants of each and make a thorough revision of the tariff. Whatever is done, if it is to accomplish any good, must be done at the earliest possible moment, and it must be done in a way which will not provoke the aggressive hostility of others who differ with us on the point of the tariff in order to bring it into law. And for that reason we have proposed, as to a large number of schedules—all the schedules except the sugar and woolens schedules—simply to increase the duty 15 per cent during the next two years and a half. It is estimated that from this increase of duty, on the basis of the imports of last year under the existing tariff, we shall secure an additional revenue of $16,500,000 or thereabouts; but assuming that even this slight raise of duty, amounting really to an addition of only about 8 per cent ad valorem, may cause—especially as to those articles which this country can make for itself without any climatic disadvantage—somewhat of a decline in imports, we reduce the estimate of revenue from this part of the bill to $15,000,000.

Now, turning to wool, the great revenue producer. Wool was placed upon the free list by the act of 1894, unjustly, as it has always seemed to me, to the farmers of this country. We propose to take wool from the free list by the bill which has been presented, and to give clothing wool—that is, wool of classes 1 and 2—a duty of 60 per cent of the duty given by the act of 1890, which is 6.6 cents per pound as to most clothing wool.

It has been thus slightly reduced from the act of 1890 for two reasons. First, we felt that if the same duty was selected, in view of the opposition which has been made in certain quarters to the wool duty, and especially that if we raised it to the point that this opposition had taken position against, it might furnish an excuse for those whose aid we must obtain in order to secure legislation to refuse to sanction what we have done.

Believing this, we dealt with wool in the manner the exigency seemed to demand. This duty runs only about two and a half years. The duty of 6.6 cents per pound will be a benefit to the woolgrowers of this country. It is not all that we desired to do, nor is it all that the Republican party proposes to do when they shall come into full possession of the Government of this country; but it is believed that for the present, with this exigency upon us, with men of hostile views standing in other departments of the Government, it is the wisest present disposition of the matter in order to secure legislation and the needed revenue.

But as to carpet wools we have retained the same duty (32 per cent) as provided by the act of 1890, simply for the fact that carpet wools are not produced to any general extent in this country, and therefore that the duty on carpet wools is essentially a revenue duty. When there is a duty placed on wool, to make it of any advantage to the woolgrowers of this country, there must at the same time be given a compensatory equivalent duty to the manufacturers of wool, for the reason that when a duty is imposed upon wool, in view of the fact that as yet we have not been able to raise all the wool that is wanted in this country, the price here will be substantially the extent of the duty in excess of the price abroad.

Now, in order to make that of any advantage to the farmer and woolgrower, you must maintain the manufacture of wool in this country, because there can not be a market opened abroad for wool under such conditions except at free-trade prices. Therefore those interested in woolgrowing have for many years recognized the necessity, in order to furnish a demand for wool in this country, that there should be put upon imported cloth a compensatory duty equivalent to the duty on wool. For that reason we have placed upon imported manufactures of wool a duty of 60 per cent of the specific square-yard and pound duty of the act of 1890, in order to conform to the reduction of the duty on clothing wools, and the same specific square-yard duty on carpets as was imposed by the act of 1890, for the reason that carpet wools have the same duty in this bill as in the act of 1890.

Now, it is found by computation that should there be an importation of wool during the next fiscal year equal to the importation of the last year we should obtain a revenue of $12,000,000 on wool alone. We imported last year about 100,000,000 pounds of carpet wool. Carpet wool is valued on the average at 9½ cents a pound, which gives substantially a duty of 3 cents per pound, and 3 cents per pound on 100,000,000 pounds gives us $3,000,000 revenue. We imported last year about 138,000,000 pounds of clothing wool. Now, if there should be as much imported next year under this tariff, if it should become law, there would be, as I have already said, an increased duty of about $9,000,000, making about $12,000,000 revenue from wool.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will, although I prefer not to be interrupted until I close.

Now, the suggestion has been made that if we place a duty upon wool, there will not be so much imported during the next fiscal year. I agree that after two or three years there will not be so much imported; but I think there must be as much for the next two years. You must bear in mind that the farmers during the last two or three years, since it was understood wool was to be placed on the free list, have been slaughtering their sheep because of the low price of wool. According to the Bureau of Statistics the production of wool in this country in the year 1894 was 54,000,000 pounds less than it was in the year 1892. Now, that has been caused by the fact that woolgrowing has become unprofitable since wool was put on the free list. Now, if we lost 54,000,000 pounds in the production of wool for 1894, as shown by the returns for the fiscal year, I think that when the returns of the present calendar year are made the loss will be found to exceed 100,000,000 pounds for the two years.

Now, you must bear in mind that as the farmers have been for the last two or three years slaughtering their sheep, it will take, even with a duty on wool, two or three years for them to again supply the deficiencies in their flocks. If this bill should become law, with a duty of 6.6 cents per pound on wool, the effect of it being to increase the price which the farmer obtains for this wool, in view of the fact that we only raise a part of the wool we consume, I have no doubt that the effect would be, first, to stop the further killing of flocks by the farmers of this country; second, the inauguration of measures looking to the increase of their flocks. Though we may not consider the duty imposed by this bill as the ultimate duty, yet even this would be an encouragement to woolgrowers to hold on to their flocks. They would speedily stop the killing of their sheep, and while there would not be an increase during the next fiscal year, there would be no further decline, and in a few years there would be an increase. It is more than probable, therefore, that in each of the next two fiscal years we shall be obliged to import as much clothing wool as we imported in the last fiscal year, and that being the case, we shall obtain $12,000,000 additional revenue from this source during that period.

From woolen goods, on which is to be laid a compensatory duty equivalent to the duty on wool, there would be a further increase of revenue to the extent of $16,000,000 if the importation should continue as large as it has been since the new tariff on woolen goods went into operation last January; but I assume that when this duty shall be laid, being specific, its effect will be to cut off, to some extent, the importations of foreign manufactures of wool coming into this market, which have already seriously injured that industry in this country. Nevertheless, supposing such an effect should result from the passage of this bill, with a reduction even to the extent of one-third of our current imports of woolen goods, we should get about twelve millions additional revenue from this source. It must be remembered that in 1892 we imported only $36,000,000 of woolen goods, while in the present calendar year the importations will exceed $60,000,000, and that on an undervaluation, because the duty now is exclusively ad valorem, which has unquestionably resulted in the importation of goods that on a fair basis of valuation would come nearer to $90,000,000. Now, we shall get from the imposition of the proposed duty on wool an increased revenue of twelve millions, and we shall get at least twelve millions more upon goods, making twenty-four millions increase of revenue from these two sources; and if we obtain fifteen millions from the horizontal increase on the other schedules, that, added to the twenty-four millions, will make thirty-nine millions. In addition to that, it is estimated that there will come about a million dollars' increase of revenue in consequence of the transfer of certain lumber from the free list to the protected list, at a rate of duty only 60 per cent of that which was imposed by the act of 1890.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is well-nigh certain that this measure, if enacted into law, would give us additional revenue of not far from $40,000,000 during the year following its enactment, and it is just this $40,000,000 that we need to make our revenue equal to or slightly more than our expenditures, to restore confidence, and to give to the business of the country the moral influence of a government that is solvent, that is paying its bills from its revenue, and that has a credit second to that of no government upon the face of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more time than I intended, and yet there are many other things that I should like to say with reference to this measure. It seems to me, sir, that its importance can not be overstated in view of the exigency which exists. It is no time for us to talk about what would be logical or illogical, or what we should or should not do under other circumstances. We are seeking to put something promptly into law that will give us the revenue that is needed, and then, by and by, when there shall have been another Presidential election, and when every department of the Government shall be in harmony with this House of Representatives [applause on the Republican side], we may proceed to investigate all the questions relating to the tariff and to carry out by legislation the principle which the Republican party believes so necessary to the prosperity of this country, and under which, during the thirty years preceding 1893, the United States enjoyed a measure of prosperity never known to any other country in the world. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up any more time, in view of the fact that the situation is so serious that urgent action is required. I was in hopes that gentlemen on the other side, with whom we have differed in the past upon questions of tariff, would welcome this opportunity to increase the revenue on revenue grounds, for whatever protection may come from this proposed legislation will be only incidental. We are not seeking at this time to pass a protection bill. We are seeking to raise more revenue, and to raise it in a way which may tend as far as it goes to restore the stricken industries of this country and give prosperity to our people.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but little of the time that has been assigned to this side for the discussion of this bill. I shall not attempt to follow my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] along the devious path which he has trodden. I shall not undertake to reply to his first argument, that this is a bill purely for revenue, and then to his last argument, that this is a bill to protect the wool industry. Those inconsistencies answer each other. But, sir, I do desire to call attention to certain facts which controvert the position assumed by the gentleman. The gentleman from Maine says that this extraordinary spectacle, this extraordinary haste, this extraordinary bill is all caused and all justified by a message of the President of the United States. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in making that statement the gentleman from Maine does not practice his habitual candor. If this bill is intended to be responsive to any suggestion from the President of the United States, then the action proposed ought to be in line with the suggestion made. The excuse the gentleman from Maine gives for the hurried manner in which this bill is presented and proposed to be rushed through is that there is a deficiency of revenue and that therefore the Government can not live without some such legislation. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report made to the House the other day, says:

> The cash balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of December, 1895, was $177,406,386.62, being $98,072,420.30 in excess of the actual gold reserve on that day, and $77,406,386.62 in excess of any sum that it would be necessary to use for replenishing that fund in case the Secretary should at any time be able to exchange currency for gold. There is, therefore, no reason to doubt the ability of the Government to discharge all its current obligations during the present fiscal year, and have a large cash balance at its close, without imposing additional taxation in any form upon the people.

This great fiscal officer, charged with the duty of making estimates and setting before us the condition of the Treasury, says that there is absolutely no necessity for imposing additional burdens in the shape of taxation upon the people. But the gentleman from Maine cites what he calls a deficiency, and claims that this demonstrates the necessity for an immediate increase of revenue.

Mr. Speaker, that gentleman knows—no man knows better—that there is in the Treasury to-day over and beyond the gold reserve, largely more free money by three times over than any deficiency that can occur during the fiscal year. It is not a question, Mr. Speaker, of borrowing money to meet expenditures; the money is already borrowed; the money is in the Treasury; but it is a question whether you will use an asset which you now have, or whether you will run posthaste to impose additional burdens upon the people in order to pile up money in the Treasury of the United States.

Now, let us understand this matter. There has been a deficiency. Why? What law caused it? I listened in vain to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to hear some confession that the deficiency and the withdrawal of gold began under what is known as the McKinley law. Not one breath did we hear indicating there had been any financial disturbance under that celebrated law. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the receipts under the McKinley law had fallen until during the four months next preceding the 1st of March, 1893, the expenditures exceeded the receipts by $4,094,021.30. That was before the inauguration of the new Administration, and of course it was years before the passage of what is known as the Wilson tariff bill.

The first deficiency, therefore, we find arose under what is known as the McKinley law. That law was then peculiarly the pet of the Republican party. In that day there was none on that side to criticise or arraign the supremacy of the gentleman whose name had been given to that bill. It was the typical Republican idea of imposing taxation; that is, to reduce the receipts going into the Treasury by increasing the receipts going into the pockets of the protected manufacturer, to put at the water's edge of our country a tax collector with rates so prohibitory that no goods could come in in competition with goods made at home, thus reducing the revenue coming into the Treasury and thus increasing the profits of the domestic manufacturer by putting a burden upon his competitor. That is the Republican idea, and that was the idea embodied in the McKinley bill. Under that bill, Mr. Speaker, the revenues fell.

My friend from Maine, so far as I could understand him at this distance, stated that there were no withdrawals of gold until after the advent of the Democratic Administration. I will not say that I apprehended his statement correctly, but that is what I understood him to say—that the withdrawals of gold did not begin until after the inauguration of the present President of the United States. What is the fact? During the nine months next preceding March, 1893—the date when the Democratic President was inaugurated—the withdrawals of gold were $58,746,000. That was under the McKinley law and under a Republican President. You gentlemen recollect very well the apprehension that existed in the Treasury Department as the time for the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland approached—the apprehension that there might be a necessity to issue bonds before that event took place. You recollect the stories that went through the press—I do not vouch for them—that already in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing they were preparing bonds to be issued to build up the gold reserve.

Mr. DOCKERY. Secretary Foster actually gave the order, which is on file in the Treasury Department, for preparing the plates.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Missouri states that the Secretary of the Treasury—Secretary Foster—actually issued the order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CRISP. I do not want to be interrupted in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I simply want to challenge the statement of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman will have an opportunity to do that in his own time. This statement, Mr. Speaker, will not be controverted—that the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury under the Administration of Mr. Harrison urged in his last report the importance of an increase in the revenue, thereby showing that the much-vaunted McKinley bill, which was built upon the Republican idea, had accomplished that which, though they do not often confess it, they always desire—prohibition of importations, so that the domestic manufacturers had the monopoly of the home market.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CRISP. I am only going to occupy a few minutes, and my friend must excuse me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no additional taxation needed. We have that information from the Secretary of the Treasury. We ought to be candid with each other. Suppose you passed this bill; suppose it increases taxation $40,000,000, and that $40,000,000 goes into the Treasury each year. How will that help the existing condition? The President's message to which my friend from Maine has referred does not appeal for more revenue. It appeals for a particular kind of money. If you agree with him that that particular kind of money ought to be piled up in the Treasury, then you ought to provide some method by which it may be accumulated. The method now suggested, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, will be wholly inadequate to prevent or remedy that condition of things which alone prompts the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to appeal to Congress for relief. They ask for a particular kind of relief; and you offer them a supposed measure of relief which you know they do not want.

You pretend that this action must be hastily taken; and yet you know that can not be done because you know there yet remains to the people of the United States a legislative body where matters can be examined and considered, where amendments are in order, where the rights of the people can be somewhat preserved and protected. It is a strange commentary, Mr. Speaker, upon our institutions that the House, composed of representatives elected immediately by the people, is unable to give any sort of careful consideration to a bill imposing $40,000,000 of taxes upon them, but that they must depend upon the other branch of the Congress to obtain a hearing and to secure consideration. [Applause.]

With reference to the bill, Mr. Speaker, I can not go into details. Friends on this side will do that. This is a "horizontal rise," not a "horizontal cut." You recollect, perhaps, a few years ago hearing a great deal about a horizontal bill, and you remember how our Republican friends ridiculed that idea at that time. And yet you find them now favoring a horizontal rise. You find them in favor of a 60 per cent increase of the rate of the act of 1890—that is, the McKinley bill. The Republican platform indorsed that bill. Now you say McKinley and McKinleyism is only 60 per cent right. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] What change has come over the spirit of your dream? Why is he not now so potential in the minds of the Republican party as he was in that day? Are there those in the household who are concerned in betraying McKinleyism? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You have 60 per cent of McKinleyism in this bill. What has become of the other 40 per cent? [Laughter and cries of "REED!" "REED!"] It is apparent in framing the present bill that the Republican party, or the Committee on Ways and Means at least, have undergone a change of heart as to the high rates of the act of 1890.

But let me read what opinion Mr. McKinley has of the method and plan adopted by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. [Laughter.] In 1884 there was a proposition for a horizontal cut. On April 30 of that year Major McKinley, addressing this House on the Morrison bill, said a horizontal revision "was a revision by the crosscut process." [Laughter.] That was his opinion of the system at that time. Further he says:

It gives no evidence of expert skill.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The majority here are amenable to all these characterizations. Again he says:

It is the invention of indolence and the mechanism of a botch workman.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Did the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. CRISP. I am calling to the attention of the majority of the House the view as to horizontal revision expressed by their great tariff leader—he whose bill was not only approved by the Republicans on this floor, but was indorsed by the Republican platform. That is all. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have used more time than I expected. Friends on this side who are to follow me will go further into the details of this bill. I confess to the House that from the notice I have received—or rather from the want of notice—I have not been able to obtain statistics from the Treasury Department. But I know we are considering a law providing for a general revision of the tariff. It is limited, it is true, to two and a half years. Why that limitation was made I can not tell. I know what its framers say on the subject. They say they expect to be in full possession of all the Departments of the Government before the expiration of that period, and when so in possession they will again revise the tariff. There is to be a continued agitation of this question and no cessation thereof. The business interests, it seems, are never to find the time when they shall have peace. This is a "temporary expedient," my friend from Maine says; and when the Republican party again secures control of the Government we are to have another bill.

When that time comes, we hope, of course, to be prepared to meet them. On that issue we are ready to go to the people. Tariff for revenue or tariff for protection; give the people a chance to choose, and I have no fears that in the future, as in the past, when fairly submitted, they will decide the question in favor of lower taxation, which, being interpreted, means in favor of themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that, as I have used about forty minutes of my time and he has used probably twenty or more, some other gentleman on that side shall follow him.

Mr. CRISP. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, while the ink is still wet upon it there is being railroaded through the House by the Republican party a bill violating nearly every principle which has ever been insisted upon by the Republican party. First, it is a horizontal bill, which, as our distinguished leader tells you, was so keenly denounced by the king of protection, Major McKinley, in 1884. It will be remembered that at that time Mr. Morrison reported a bill to this House providing for uniform reduction of the tariff upon the necessaries of life, the purpose being to relieve the people from unnecessary and onerous burdens. Mr. McKinley made a carefully prepared speech on that bill on April 30, 1884. It is printed in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 134. His criticism of the Morrison bill was largely devoted to the reduction being uniform, or, as he called it, horizontal. In referring to this feature of the bill, on page 136, Mr. McKinley says:

What can be said of the capacity of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means as evidenced by the bill now before us? It is a confession upon its face of absolute incapacity to grapple with the great subject. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The Morrison bill will never be suspected of having passed the scrutiny of intelligent experts like the Tariff Commission. This is a revision by the crosscut process. It gives no evidences of the expert's skill. It is the invention of indolence. I will not say of ignorance, for the gentlemen of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means are competent to prepare a tariff bill. I repeat, it is not only the invention of indolence, but it is the mechanism of a botch workman.

And, on page 40, Mr. McKinley says:

No man on this floor can determine its consequences or predict its results. It is a leap in the dark.

I beg to ask, if the uniform or horizontal bill was so vicious in 1884 and was so bitterly denounced by Republicans at that time, how can they be justified before the country in now insisting upon the same character of legislation?

INCREASE OF REVENUE NOT NEEDED.

Second. It is a bill to raise revenue, when no revenue is needed, and such measures have been denounced by the best and most conservative leaders of the Republican party.

The distinguished head of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY] had us in session during a great part of Christmas day preparing and perfecting this measure, which he informed the committee and the House was in response to the demand of our eminent Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle; and this statement is made in the face of the fact that Mr. Carlisle's report, so far from containing any request for legislation which would give an increase of revenue, especially states and repeats that no such legislation is desired or needed. On page 53 of his report, Mr. Carlisle says:

The cash balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of December, 1895, was $177,406,386.62, being $98,072,420.30 in excess of the actual gold reserve on that day, and $77,406,386.62 in excess of any sum that it would be necessary to use for replenishing that fund in case the Secretary should at any time be able to exchange currency for gold.

This shows that instead of a deficiency there is an actual excess of over $77,000,000.

The Secretary then says:

There is, therefore, no reason to doubt the ability of the Government to discharge all its current obligations during the present fiscal year, and have a large cash balance at its close, without imposing additional taxation in any form upon the people.

In order to emphasize this statement Mr. Carlisle repeats his objection to legislation of this character. On page 54 he says:

While the situation does not require any legislation for raising additional revenue by taxation at this time, it is such as to require the strictest economy in appropriations and public expenditures.

Now, in the face of these statements and recommendations by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Republican party proceed to do exactly what Mr. Carlisle asks them not to do, and yet they say they are doing this in response to his request. The Republican leaders boldly assert that the falling off of customs receipts has been due to the Wilson bill, in the face of the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, which show precisely the contrary.

INCREASED REVENUE UNDER WILSON BILL.

The Wilson bill did not become a law until August 28, 1894, and therefore the customs receipts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, were all collected under the McKinley rates, while the customs receipts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, were nearly all collected under the Wilson bill rates; and Mr. Carlisle tells us that the receipts for one year under the Wilson bill rates exceeded those collected under the McKinley bill rates by $20,340,086.83. I read his language from page 52 of his report:

The revenue derived from customs during the fiscal year 1895 exceeded the revenue derived from the same source in 1894 by the sum of $20,340,086.83.

THE BILL INJURES BUSINESS BY USELESS AGITATION OF THE TARIFF.

Third. The action of the Republican party in insisting upon this bill is astonishing for another reason. During the last year the Republican side of the House were loud in their assertions that nothing was so detrimental to the business interests of the country as tariff agitation. They asserted that the worst kind of a tariff bill was better than frequent changes or frequent propositions to change the tariff. They asserted that what the business people of the country needed was quiet and an assurance that the tariff laws were stable and permanent. To-day they reverse that position, and the entire power of the Republican party is exercised in a most uncalled-for and injudicious agitation of this subject. They inform the country that this bill is to pass the House to-day, and that it will speedily become the law, and that in a short time the tariff on every imported article will be materially changed, thus doing all in their power to disturb trade, to interfere with commerce; yet every member who votes for this bill knows that its requiem will be sung as it passes from the doors of this House to that deliberative body on the other side of the Capitol, where the rights of the people will receive mature consideration.

Before I leave this subject I want to call attention to the fact that had not the decision of the Supreme Court cut off the income-tax feature of the Wilson bill the revenue from that measure would by this time have exceeded our expenses by nearly $100,000,000.

TO HOARD GREENBACKS WOULD BE AS DETRIMENATL AS THEIR CANCELLATION.

The Republican leaders tell us that they desire this additional revenue in order that the money thus received for customs may be used to pay the running expenses of the Government, and thus enable the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold greenbacks and Treasury notes and thus retain them in the Treasury. The advocates of this bill especially disclaim any desire to destroy the greenback and Treasury notes, but I beg to ask if the effect upon the people to permanently hoard them in the Treasury would not be just as detrimental as it would be to enact a law providing for their cancellation.

SECOND SECTION ESPECIALLY OBJECTIONABLE.

There is one feature of this bill to which I ask your especial attention. It is lines 17 to 25 of the second section of the bill. It will be seen that in that clause the McKinley bill is being restored in toto, up to the very extreme of that measure, which three years ago was so bitterly denounced by the American people.

Mr. HARDY. How was it last year?

Mr. WHEELER. The election last year could not have been materially affected by anything resulting from the Wilson bill, and especially not by the woolen schedule, because that did not go into effect until nearly two months after the election took place. The criticisms, as I recall them, were that we were slow in enacting our bill into law. The depression, which was due more than anything else to Republican profligacy, seemed to impress the people. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Since the Wilson tariff law has become understood by the people it has certainly received their approval. Manufactories have increased all over the country, wages are increasing, and manufacturing industries are again becoming prosperous.

Mr. HARDY. That is, in England.

Mr. WHEELER. I hold in my hand an authenticated statement that under the provisions of that wise measure which passed this House in August, 1894, all the manufactures of our country were increasing, that wages in some thirty of the largest establishments of the country were being raised, and general prosperity pervaded all our manufacturing industries.

M'KINLEY BILL REDUCED AND WILSON BILL INCREASED WAGES.

The first column in the following table shows the reduction of wages and the closing of factories which took place just after October, 1890, the date that the McKinley bill went into operation.

The second column shows the increase of wages and the reopening of closed manufactories which took place just after the Wilson bill became operative.

BETHLEHEM IRON WORKS, BETHLEHEM, PA.

December 6, 1890, works closed; 1,000 men out.	May 30, 1895, wages advanced 11 per cent; 2,000 men affected.
January 29, 1891, wages reduced 10 per cent after February 1.	June 15, 1895, 5 per cent to 10 per cent second increase.

WASHINGTON WOOLEN MILLS, LAWRENCE, MASS.

December 13, 1890, mills closed.	April 5, 1895, wages of 4,000 men advanced.

ACUSHNET MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

December 20, 1890, mill No. 1, spinners and back-boys struck because wages had been reduced.	January 4, 1895, wages increased.

JOHN CHASE & SONS, WEBSTER, MASS.

December 25, 1890, mill running on three-quarters time.	April, 1895, wages of 300 men advanced 10 per cent.

CARNEGIE BROS'. STEEL WORKS, HOMESTEAD, PA.

January 1, 1891, wages reduced 9 per cent. February 21, 1891, 4,000 men out. April 9, 1891, wages reduced 5 per cent. August 15, 1891, open-hearth department closed; 300 men out. July 1, 1892, 3,800 men strike against heavy wage reductions; several weeks of riot and bloodshed.	May 14, 1895, wages advanced 10 per cent.

ILLINOIS STEEL WORKS, CHICAGO, ILL.

January 8, 1891, works, except blast furnaces, closed; 1,500 men out. August 11, 1892, for Milwaukee works, 10 per cent reduction in finishing department accepted.	June 20, 1895, wages of 7,000 men increased 10 per cent.

SANITARY WARE MANUFACTURING (POTTERY), TRENTON, N. J.

January 10, 1891, reduction of 33⅓ per cent proposed. April 30, 1891, pressers reduced 22 per cent; men have been on strike many weeks. May 14, 1891, reduced 7 per cent.	June 16, 1895, 10 per cent to 40 per cent increase.

MAHONING AND SHENANGO VALLEY IRON FURNACES, YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

These statements conclusively show that a tariff law which cuts us off from the markets of the world is disastrous to the wageworkers in every vocation, and is also disastrous to manufacturing interests of every character.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. WHEELER. I beg my friend to excuse me.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Just one question. Do you state that seriously?

Mr. WHEELER. I state it positively, and no one knows better than does the gentleman himself the correctness of the statement.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The incorrectness of it, you mean.

Mr. WHEELER. In reply to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARDY] said about England, I would respectfully call his attention to incontrovertible truths that I incorporated in a speech which I made on this floor May 4, 1888, by which I showed that, especially in cotton goods industries, England had, prior to that time, paid higher wages to operatives than were paid anywhere in the United States or in any other part of the world, and the reason was that our extreme protective tariff had prevented our supplying the world with cotton goods, and this had given England the full control of the markets of the world outside of the United States and enabled English manufacturers to supply the world with some $400,000,000 cotton goods, while we supplied the world with but about $12,000,000.

The demand by foreign nations for English cotton goods being nearly forty times the demand for American goods, there was necessarily a demand for cotton operatives in England nearly forty times as great as it was in the United States, and this of necessity had an effect upon the wages.

Now, the second section of the bill we are discussing, the paragraph to which I ask special attention, includes articles which are found in the home of every poor man in our country. It includes articles which we are now manufacturing more cheaply than they are made anywhere else in the world. We are supplying the world with carpets, and the only purpose in restoring the McKinley figures is to restore that system by which the manufacturers can have the entire control of the American market, and by combinations close up such factories as they choose, raise prices to the highest degree possible, and reduce the weeping, starving operatives to the lowest possible figure of wages. That method followed the passage of the McKinley bill, and the statement which I have read shows that the manufacturers who have increased wages under the Wilson bill reduced them under the McKinley bill shortly after its passage.

REPUBLICANS FINALLY ACCEPT DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLES.

The Republican leaders state that this bill is a bill for revenue. I am very glad indeed to see that the Republican party have at last adopted one of the cardinal principles of Democracy. When the tariff bills were discussed fourteen years ago, the question of revenue from tariff was not considered. Leading Republicans contended that a tariff bill should be for protection, not for revenue.

In 1882 Mr. William A. Russell, of Lawrence, Mass., in his speech on this floor, went so far as to contend that a tariff which produced any revenue at all was not satisfactory to the interests which he represented. He said:

> There is no protection in a strictly revenue tariff—that is, to an American manufacturer; for if a revenue is to be derived from an imported article it must be imported, which certainly involves its manufacture elsewhere, and the rate of duty must be so fixed as to invite its importation. Therefore, a tariff can not be adjusted on a single article to serve the double purpose of revenue and protection. It must be either at a point to check importation, and thus protect, or it must be at a point low enough to admit importation, and thus produce a revenue. That is, when fixed at a revenue point it ceases to protect, and when fixed at a protective point it ceases to yield a revenue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the arguments in favor of this mad theory of protection are the old arguments that were made fifty years ago when the manufacturers of the United States were insignificant as compared to those of Europe. Now the condition is entirely changed. To-day we produce more than one-third of the staple products of the earth. We produce 80 per cent of the corn and 30 to 35 per cent of the wheat. We produce from 33 to 39 per cent of the steel, from 30 to 35 per cent of the coal, from 25 to 35 per cent of the iron ore, from 30 to 35 per cent of the pig iron, from 26 to 30 per cent of the finished iron, and from 80 to 86 per cent of the raw cotton. The iron and coal figures I take from the reports of the American Iron and Steel Association and the cotton figures from the last report of Messrs. Latham, Alexander & Co., New York. On page 157 they state that the world's supply of cotton last year was 14,050,000 bales of 400 pounds each, of which the United States supplied 12,050,000, which shows that last year the United States supplied from 85 to 86 per cent of the cotton of the world. We have but 4 per cent of the world's population, and certainly no one will contend that 4 per cent of the world's population can consume 40 per cent of the world's products.

American toil is now demanding the markets of the world, and, in the language of Mr. Blaine, I ask, How can this bill aid in getting a market for a barrel of pork or a bushel of wheat? Our changed condition in the last fifty years demands a change of policy. Our increasing productions admonish us to increase in every way possible the markets which consume the products of American toil. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair please inform me what time remains on each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS). One hour and seven minutes remain to the gentleman from Maine and one hour and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the Republican party in this House is ready to meet the responsibility that is upon it to-day, and presents a bill for the purpose of increasing the revenue. Two years from now, I want to inform the gentlemen upon the other side, the Republican party will again meet the responsibility of that hour, and will present to this House and the Senate, and to a Republican President, a bill for the protection of American labor and American agriculture, and will write that bill on the statute books. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. LESTER rose.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not be interrupted, Mr. Speaker. I only have ten minutes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says that there was a deficiency of revenue under the tariff act of 1890. Mr. Speaker, the tariff act of 1890 produced sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government down to the 1st day of November, 1892. Not only that, it put into the Treasury a surplus of over $38,000,000. I can not stop to describe the other benefits that are known and read of by all men that followed from the tariff act of 1890 into every nook and corner of the United States of America.

In November, 1892, there was a deficiency in the revenue. There was not quite enough to meet the expenditures. But the gentleman from Georgia seems to have forgotten what also occurred in 1892, when the Democracy was placed in power in the White House and in both ends of the Capitol, and their destructive hand was cast like a shadow over every industry in this broad land of ours. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was that shadow of destruction that brought a deficiency of revenue in November, 1892. It was followed by their acquisition of power, on the inauguration of their President in March, 1893, and by the events which followed, until the Wilson-Gorman bill was written upon the statute books; and from the very day and hour that you placed that bill upon the statute books there has been a deficiency in the revenue of the Government. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that for two months the Treasury Department figured out a surplus; but it is equally true that in each of the months that followed there was an excess of expenditures over the expenditures of the month preceding of from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000. Your deficit in the revenue brought further distrust among the people.

When we assembled in the summer of 1893, the President of the United States informed us that all that was necessary to bring prosperity to this country was the repeal of the so-called Sherman silver act. The Republican party united with a few of you who voted for it on the other side and repealed that silver act; but we told you then that if you wanted to bring prosperity back to the country you should follow it by the further declaration that you would not have any tariff legislation; that you would not interfere with the industries of this country. And we predicted to you then that if you persisted in your agitation, that if you persisted in the passage of your bill, evils would come upon the country; and they have come since that time, and have followed as surely as night follows the day. We have had this run upon the Treasury. Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says that there is $175,000,000 in the Treasury—$100,000,000 of redemption fund and $75,000,000 more—and that is true; but you have borrowed $181,000,000 since you came into power; and if you had not borrowed a dollar of that money the $175,000,000 would be gone and the Treasury bankrupt by a sum of over $6,000,000. Do you want to continue that state of things? Do you want to deal with syndicates that charged a premium of $10,000,000 upon a $60,000,000 loan? Does not your cheek blush with shame at even the suggestion in a newspaper, whether it may be true or not, that one of the powers of Europe was coming to America with her gold to help us out of the difficulty. Is it not about time that the American people shall cease to be placed in the position of a mendicant and suppliant going to the Governments of Europe or to the syndicates of Europe begging them for gold to replenish the Treasury?

Two remedies are proposed. The President says it is necessary to negotiate a loan of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 to retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes. There is not a business man but what says that any such operation as that in the present condition of the financial affairs of the country would bring ruin and disaster to the country. Are any of you in favor of carrying out the President's scheme, or the scheme of the able Secretary of the Treasury, to retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes by issuing $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 in bonds?

Another remedy is proposed. The Republican party has lived long enough to be able to deal with financial questions, and long enough to observe that no business man or business corporation, or even a great government, can exist unless its income is sufficient to pay its expenses. It did not take us two and a half years to find that out. We told you so two years ago. The same thing is true to-day. You have been running along here and calling it a temporary deficiency. Why, I remember that a leader on your side, in the last hours of the last Congress, in his optimistic way, marched down the aisle and proclaimed that a surplus was almost in sight. Yet we have lived nine months, and the surplus and the sight of it have been growing less every day. Something must be done to relieve the Treasury. We propose a business method. We propose that the income shall equal the outgo. Now it lacks nearly $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 per annum. We offer it to you. We offer it to you in the shape of your own tariff bill, with a horizontal increase of 15 per cent. The gentleman from Georgia has read what a former member of Congress has said of this as a "crosscut method." Gentlemen, this is a "crosscut method." We are going by the "crossroad," using the swiftest way to go to the relief of the Treasury and your Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is not our idea of a tariff bill. We are not satisfied with your Wilson-Gorman bill, as no one was satisfied with it, even on your side. We are offering it as a question of revenue, and not as one of protection of a single industry of the United States, and yet incidentally there is not one industry that had been laid open to destruction by that bill——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield two more minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. There is not such an industry but that will receive some protection from this bill.

I appeal to you, my Democratic friends from the Northern States. How can any of you refuse to vote for it? Why, you often cry that you favor a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. This is your kind of a tariff. We give it to you as a temporary measure. We give it to you to increase the revenue. We give it your President and your Secretary of the Treasury to help lift the business of the country and the Treasury out of the bankrupt condition which seems to be the result of every Democratic Administration that ever had full control of the country from the time of Monroe's inauguration down to the time of Grover Cleveland. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. MCMILLIN withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition or intention to enter into any discussion of the schedules of this bill. I merely wish to contribute a few remarks toward the avoidance of any misunderstanding, either in this House or elsewhere, of the character of the pending measure.

As I have had occasion to say, it is in no sense a protective tariff bill. It is in no sense a revision of the tariff. It is not an attempt to correct the inequalities of the tariff. It is not such a bill as the Republican party would pass if it were dealing with the tariff as such. It is simply an emergency revenue measure, matured in haste, under the whip and spur of a pressing and cruel necessity. When passed it will be—and history will record it as such—a conspicuous tribute to the patriotism of the Republican party. Rising above party prejudice at the summons of a Democratic President, at the sacrifice of our own personal convenience, resisting the importunities of our constituents, who would have us pass a bill that we apprehend could not become a law, we offer the country, in this hour of its dire extremity, a measure which, though to some extent a concession of principle, will, we think, to some degree afford relief.

The President of the United States, in his official capacity, has advised us that the Republic stands in peril, peril of such a character that he begs us to forego our personal convenience and to aid him by such legislation as we may be able to mature in the present difficulty surrounding the National Treasury.

We know well why it is that this dire calamity has come upon us. It is because our expenditures exceed our revenues, and because of the consequent distrust that succeeded to the universal feeling of confidence that had hitherto prevailed up until the accession of the Democratic party to power. Under the act of 1890, up until to the time that Democratic tariff legislation was threatened, our revenues exceeded our expenditures by $38,000,000. Our commerce, foreign and domestic, was increased. The balance of trade was in our favor. No person found any fault with our currency then. No person attempted a raid upon the gold reserve. Now, under this tariff law and a Democratic Administration, precisely the reverse of this condition exists. Our revenues are not equal to our expenditures; we are borrowing money on bonds issued in time of peace. We import more than we export; the balance of trade is against us. Under all these circumstances, I submit, is it not plain to any intelligent man that the seat of our difficulty, the cause of our trouble, is lack of revenue?

We believed, when we came to our response to the appeal of the President of the United States for aid, that there was but one honest course open to an honest Republican Congress, and that was to proceed to raise revenue through the custom-houses.

Now, I have doubts as to whether any gentleman who has not had the experience appreciates the difficulty that confronted the Committee on Ways and Means when they came to mature a revenue bill. We would have liked to have picked out from the various schedules those items the increase of the duty on which would bring us additional revenue, and in the first instance we made an attempt to deal with the matter in that way. A very few hours' discussion made it perfectly patent that no bill upon that line of policy could be presented to the House within such a time as to afford the relief called for by the President. We were compelled, then, to deal not with items, but with schedules, and that is a matter about which no man can have greater regret than I. I would like to have repealed that wicked, sectional piece of tariff legislation that puts cotton ties on the free list and northern hoop iron on the dutiable list. I would like to have increased the duty upon that splendid American industry, built up by the law of 1890, that keeps so much of our capital at home and gives to so many of our laborers employment upon their own soil, the tin-plate industry. [Applause on the Republican side.] I cast my vote for this bill, not because it embodies what I would like to have in it, but because it is the best we can have under the circumstances, and because I believe that it is a high, patriotic duty to answer the demands of the President. I trust that when it comes to that other body that has to pass on it equally with us we shall find that what my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] says is true, that it is a Republican Senate, and that when it comes to the Executive he will make the concessions that patriotism may demand of him, and let the bill become a law, to the immediate relief of the country. And then, repeating what my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] suggested a while ago, two years hence, when the successor of the two tidal waves that already have swept the land from ocean to ocean shall sweep some great Republican leader into the White House and give us a Republican Senate and House, we will frame a tariff bill which will be in the interest of America for Americans. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield time on that side?

Mr. CRISP. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the Populist members, while few in number, believe that they are not less sincere in their convictions on this subject than the great Republican party on our right or the great Democratic party on our left. Well do we remember that for many years the American people as a mass believed in remaining colonies of the mother country while the few proclaimed, "Give us liberty or give us death."

Well do we remember that the great Republican party, with its little coterie, for years proclaimed to the American people, "Let us emancipate the black man," while the great phalanxes represented on the Republican side throughout the North, as well as on the Democratic side throughout the South, said, "Nay, nay; it is the Divine will that they should serve their white brethren."

Our friends say that this difficulty is located in the tariff schedules. The little bunch that represents the Populist party says, "Nay, nay; we have tried this in vain for, lo, these many years; that it is a fundamental error in the financial system that has destroyed the prosperity of all gold-standard countries; that the true remedy is not in taxing the impoverished people more, but it will be found in an increase of their money supply and in making money a servant of the people instead of their master." The Populist party believes that the necessary expenses of operating this Government should be equitably distributed over every industry that may be incidentally benefited thereby. We discard the doctrine of raw material. It is a device, a delusion, and a snare in the interests of the manufacturers of the world.

There is no such thing as raw material. Wool is the finished product of the farmer and the raw material of the spinner; the thread the raw material of the weaver and the cloth his finished product; the cloth is the raw material of the tailor and the suit of clothes his finished product. And so it runs through the evolution of an industry. Therefore, as a Populist, I would cheerfully vote for a tariff on wool in proportion to that now existing on woolen goods if you would stop there, but your methods are such that they are not tolerable. You come into this House with a combine and deal and say that in order that the farmer shall be given a tariff upon wool that the manufacturers' present high tariff must be greatly increased. You say to the West that by virtue of giving us a tariff on wool we must forego the silver issue. You shackle the Republican members, then tell them to take the little pittance of tariff on wool and to be quiet on silver, the overshadowing industry of their country, or to take nothing. Some of us prefer nothing to this bagatelle on your hard conditions. Our forces believe the way to make up the deficiency is to coin the seigniorage in the Treasury and pay it out on the Government obligations. We know you disbelieve in this, because you have learned from the Eastern press that it is in the sole interests of the silver miner.

I respectfully refer you to Japan, Russia, Mexico, and to every other country using silver while we are scrambling for gold. They are building up manufacturing plants and thriving beyond precedent with the exclusive use of the very money you so scornfully reject. The farmers in England are now proclaiming from the housetops everywhere that the only possible success for the English farmer in the future is to reinstate silver or to establish a par of exchange between the two metals. They tell their Government that in England, if silver was reinstated, not a bushel of wheat could be imported from the Orient. A British consul from one of the islands of Japan informs the English people that Japan is one of the most prosperous countries upon the globe; that she can manufacture goods, take them to England, and sell them at 50 cents on the dollar of the home price, take the gold, buy silver bullion, return to Japan, have it coined, and recover the apparent shortage.

He tells his people that Japan owes no public debt, buys everything but a little machinery and a few other indispensable articles with silver, pays her laborers, taxes, insurance, home-grown raw material, and domestic debts in silver.

We say as Populists if you will come back to American principles, if you will come back to our national currency, that the farmers will yet regain their old markets and the manufacturers will have customers that can buy at home, and they can compete with silver-using countries abroad, and the people at large will be prosperous. There will be no deficiency, no occasion for bond issues, no paralysis of business. What the country demands is cures, and not palliatives. Your tariff measure can only help a few classes at the expense of many others. We are not suffering for the want of an abundance of products. We are suffering from the want of consumers, or, rather, from their inability to buy. I want to say to our friends in the East, when you destroyed the American farmer and silver miner in the West you struck a death blow to your manufactories. Your remedy will be at furthest but a temporary relief and unquestionably a permanent injury. What the country wants is something to prevent deficiencies and to cure the structural defects of our false system. When you destroy the miners and the farmers you destroy every industry, including your own.

One of the reasons why I will not vote for this bill is that I, with many other Populists, have determined never to vote another dollar to the manufacturers until they conclude to vote the people some money with which to buy their goods. I know our friends will not study this question while we submissively yield to their demands without requiring some reciprocation. Our Eastern friends think that the sum of the American people are embodied in the great money centers. This House has long thought that it performed its whole duty when it obtained their plaudits. They are always referred to as the business men of this country. The dealers in ready money and securities have for twenty years completely controlled this House or the other, as they determined, when any great governmental measure was involved. You have, I think, long since concluded that the chief industry of this country is carried on by brokers and stock gamblers; they have been favored so long and you have made the per cent of the entire game so much in their favor that they now have all of the ready money of the world. They have long since ceased to put a dollar into open enterprise or into any development of the country that tends to employ a day's labor or that incurs a possibility of loss. The balance of the people are submissive borrowers.

When the farmer is considering the question of feeding his crops, the banker says to him, "If you will give me a mortgage upon your cattle, upon your grain, and upon your hay, I will lend you the money with which to feed." He says the same to the manufacturer; he says the same to every other man who puts a dollar into a private enterprise. He takes no chance upon building up the country in which he lives, but he enjoys the very best in the land.

Now, I am not opposed to bankers. I believe in a banking system, but I do not believe in this Congress turning this country into a rendezvous for all the gold gamblers of earth.

I do not believe in substituting the specialists in the art of handling money and securities so as to make the largest possible private gains at the expense of the public, thereby making the public depend upon them for its financial life and liberty, for the unselfish and patriotic governmental financier who works for an independent constitutional money to be made for and by the Government for all of the people. There is no question but that such a change has taken place. I do not believe in making money superior to other property. Now, can any Western Representative accept the little benefit to one industry upon these hard terms? You propose to pull through your bonding system with the same machinery; you will give the West a little wool tariff; a poor recompense, indeed, for the advantage you gain, and then demand your portion of bonds in addition to the heavy increase in general tariff duties.

Because of the fact that the rules of the House only allowed a fraction of a minute for each member to express himself on this all-important question, if each one could have obtained the floor, and I being awarded only ten minutes for the whole Populist party, and received this through the kindness of Judge CRISP, I feel inclined to take advantage of the leave to print and give some reasons why an individual Representative can do so little for his constituents as against the great majority.

The rules of the House by long usage give the Committee on Rules and the chairmen of the different committees practical control of the measures in the House and of the time for debate. This autocratic rule is fully exposed upon a casual examination of the committees.

It will be seen that the little State of Maine, the State of Massachusetts, and the State of Iowa have more power in directing the business of the House of the American Congress than all of the other States in the Union. This is an offspring of the rule that they must be advanced according to their seniority on the committees, and the people of these favored States have seen fit to return the same members consecutively for a great many years. Under this unrepresentative rule the little State of Maine, with less than 700,000 inhabitants, has Mr. DINGLEY, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means; Mr. BOUTELLE, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; Mr. MILLIKEN, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Speaker, who also has the first place on the Committee on Rules. This little State has four Representatives in the House and four chairmanships and the Speakership, being far more than have all of the States from Colorado to California, inclusive, and yet California has nearly twice the population and more than four times the area and wealth.

The population of Iowa is about two million, and she has eleven Representatives. There are seven good places to the credit of the State, being as follows: HENDERSON, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who also has the second place on the Committee on Rules, next to the Speaker; HEPBURN, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; HULL, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs; LACEY, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands; PERKINS, chairman of the Committee on Printing, and HAGER, chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills. New York has ten, Pennsylvania has nine, and Massachusetts has six, and so it runs, while twenty-six of the States have no chairmanships at all.

These favorite States not only have the chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee, but they have the Judiciary, the Banking and Currency, Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and Rivers and Harbors, which control everything of substantial benefit to the people at large. The rule also prevails in the House that the Speaker selects whom he will recognize as entitled to the floor, not according to the person who first rises to his feet and addresses the Speaker, but according to his simple desire. If the member desires to present a measure to the House, he goes and sees the Speaker and has to tell him or show him his proposition and then the Speaker will inform him as to the probability of recognition for such a measure.

While the House was meeting and adjourning simply, the Populist members agreed in their conference to introduce a resolution in the House and Senate inviting the Finance Committee in the Senate and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in the House to investigate and report what effect on the industrial condition of the country, if any, the divergence between gold and silver had. Senator ALLEN promptly introduced the resolution in the Senate, and it passed by a good majority. I was appointed to secure recognition from the Speaker and have him ask the House for unanimous consent for its consideration there. Upon approaching the Speaker, he very thoroughly examined my resolution, and firmly but kindly replied, "I should not care to recognize you for this resolution," though the House was then in idleness. Had it been some little local measure or something that the Speaker approved he doubtless would have extended the courtesy.

I mention this simply to show the complete dependency of individual members on the will of the Speaker and the committees.

All of the committeemen in the House have the first right to the floor on matters coming from their respective committees, and those holding different chairmanships also rank high on the important committees of which they are not chairmen and get the additional right to the floor, so the individual who is not on an important committee must, by the courtesy of some one else, beg the opportunity to address the House, and can get recognition in no other way. New members or members of a new party are practically ostracised in the House and have no power under the rules to promulgate any of their principles.

As a further discussion of the silver question, I append a short interview published in the Philadelphia Evening Item of December 23, 1895:

The Item man asked Mr. BELL if he would give some of the reasons why his constituents favored the free coinage of silver, outside of their interest as silver miners. The answer is one of the very strongest arguments that could be presented in favor of free coinage.

The philosophy of money has been greatly mystified by confusing specialists in so handling money and securities as to make the greatest possible private gains at the expense of the public, and rendering the Government wholly dependent upon them for its financial life and liberty, with the unselfish patriotic economist who attempts to evolve a financial system for the greatest good to the greatest number and to make the Government financially superior to and independent of the professional money dealer.

For the past two decades the dealers in ready money and securities have been complete masters of the Government. The economic theory of money is that it shall be a servant of the people in facilitating their exchanges. The practice now prevailing makes the people its complete slave. The world has gone mad on the desire for money to lend for interest. The professional money lender and municipal bond dealer never put a dollar into development or open enterprise, but procure enterprising neighbors, who can doubly secure them, to take all of the chances of loss. The banker says to the farmer, "Now, I will advance you sufficient money with which to buy beef cattle if you will give me a good interest and a mortgage on your hay, corn, and cattle. I know there is good money in it for you to feed your crop." The farmer takes all the chances of loss, as do the manufacturers, builders, and every other vocation that tends to employ a day's labor or develop a public or private enterprise.

The per cent of the whole game has been so long in favor of the banker and bondholder that they now have all of the money in their end of the box. The balance of the world are submissive borrowers. These classes care no more for gold than they do for silver. They are adverse to any form of money that furnishes an ample supply without the intervention of banks. It is interest-bearing bonds and bank paper they want.

The reason they favor a single gold standard is that it furnishes the people only one-half as much full legal-tender money as the double standard. The owners of ready money are as much interested in the limiting of money as the owners of horses, hogs, wheat, or cotton are pleased with the limited supply of these articles. The scarcer the article, whether money or property, the dearer the price. These dealers are struggling for dear money and cheap property.

No logical attempt has been made to establish the gold standard on the merits of the system. The gold votaries have held up the single silver standard of Mexico and warned the public to beware of Mexicanizing our money. The bimetallists never advocated a silver standard or a gold standard, but supplicate for both metals, because this would double the volume of full legal-tender money, and when one metal becomes scarce or a scramble for one metal takes place the other will come to our rescue and keep our domestic finances healthy while the money kings fight over the coveted coin. If we are compelled to have a single standard, then by all means give us the metal that our great trade competitors use and the one not in the great international scramble.

A most important factor not generally considered is the domestic exchanges among ourselves, which constitute ninety odd per cent of all our commercial transactions. We want an abundant national currency for this trade. When our banks were suspending in every quarter, when wreckage and involuntary insolvency were rife everywhere in 1893, José Maximillano Damen, of Durango, Mexico, contrasted his own country with ours while visiting the World's Fair at Chicago. He declared that instead or its being a "silver trouble" it was a genuine "gold trouble"; that the United States was trying to do business on a substance it could not get—gold; that its paper, which was supposed to represent gold, was a swindle; that it only represented "credit and confidence," which were worthless in times of panic, as the gold could not be had with which to pay; that the banks of Mexico were in excellent condition; that the interior trade of Mexico did not depend upon the price of silver in New York or London, as inside of Mexico a silver dollar was worth a hundred cents, and that its depression in New York and London simply caused the people of Mexico to reduce their foreign purchases to the most indispensable articles, which was a real benefit in disguise.

The same may be said of Japan and all other silver-using countries. In fact, history probably has shown no such increase of trade and manufacturing in so short a time as has been developed by Japan, while the Caucasian nations have been scrambling among themselves for gold. This scramble has been in the exclusive interest of the money brokers. We have permitted all of our domestic industries to be paralyzed and formidable competitors to become thoroughly intrenched in our great marts of trade through the exclusive use of the very money that our Government has been trying to destroy.

There is not and never can be such a thing as an international legal-tender money. The precious metals by weight, whether in coin or bars, by common consent have been accepted and treated as a kind of international medium of exchange, but so little metal is required to pay these balances, as compared with our domestic commerce, that it is an insignificant incident merely of our monetary necessities. Immediately upon the destruction of silver in the United States India, Russia, and other silver-using countries felt the beneficial effects. For many years last past an ounce of silver would exchange for a bushel of wheat in Liverpool both before and since demonetization in this country. If England had to pay $1.29 for an ounce of silver, her wheat cost her $1.29. If she paid 70 cents an ounce, her wheat cost her 70 cents a bushel. The mints of India remained open to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 15 to 1 up to June 26, 1893, and were then closed because the Indian manufacturers were controlling the markets for manufactured goods. England and other countries would buy silver at from 80 cents to $1 per ounce and have it coined into rupees at par and buy her wheat and cotton in India. This benefited England in obtaining wheat and cotton, but it made India the manufacturer. To meet this competition we had to sell our products for enough less than the India price to make good the profits made on these silver bullion purchases. This impoverished the American farmer.

India, Japan, and other oriental countries followed this up by establishing great manufacturing plants, through the aid of enterprising English, American, and other Caucasian citizens, and they are now invading every civilized country with their manufactured products.

All labor, transportation, raw material produced on the ground, living expenses, taxes, insurance, and domestic debts, etc., are paid in silver money. Under present conditions they can sell their products to any gold country for 60 per cent of the home prices in gold, buy silver bullion, take it to their mints, and recover all of their shorts where their mints remain open, as in Japan. The same force that destroyed the profits of American farming is now sapping the life out of American manufacturing.

According to Joseph Nimono, former statistician of the Government, the imports from other States into the arid regions of the West in 1892 were $200,000,000; exports from Western States into the other States, $240,000,000, $100,000,000 annually more than the trade of the whole country with Central, and South America and the West India islands. He declared that this trade was worth more to the Eastern manufacturers than the whole trade with South America and Europe combined.

Every silver mine of the West used engines, boilers, steel, cars, iron, piping, a great line of all kinds of manufactured goods, caused the building and equipping of railroads, opened coal mines, built up towns and all kinds of new enterprises. These people were content to mine while silver would pay and allow the East to do their manufacturing, but with the destruction of this industry, manufacturing plants are now going up all over the Rocky Mountain States and they are making steel rails, paper, cotton and woolen goods, etc., and it is now, as shown by Mr. Henry Clews & Co.'s Folder of recent date, one of the most prosperous portions of the country. The manufacturers of the East, by their blind policy in catering to the money lenders, surely killed the goose that laid the golden egg when they destroyed the prosperity of the farmers and miners—their best customers of their own country—and built up a destructive competition abroad.

In 1792 Congress fixed the United States ratio at 15 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. In 1803 France fixed her ratio at 15½ ounces of silver to 1 of gold. Both countries threw their mints open to the free and unlimited coinage of both metals. The United States ratio being more favorable to silver than the French and other European countries, it freely coined and circulated silver at home and shipped its gold, in coin and bars, abroad in payment of balances, foreign debts, etc. France freely coined and circulated gold at home and shipped her silver abroad for like purposes. In 1834 Congress changed the United States ratio to 16 to 1. This reversed conditions, and we then freely coined and circulated gold at home and shipped our silver abroad in payment of balances and foreign obligations, and France freely coined and circulated silver at home and shipped her gold for the same purposes, without material harm to either country. These changes were caused solely by favors shown by statute by one country and then by the other.

Under ordinary conditions the price of all necessary substances is controlled by supply and demand. As proved by a successful experience of eighty years, the Government stamp and the legal-tender quality given to silver by a great trading nation, with the right of unlimited coinage, will create such a demand as to hold it to the most favorable ratio fixed by any one of them. When the United States and French mints were closed silver stood at the ratio of 15½ to 1, and the ratio of weight in the world to-day is about 15½ tons of silver to 1 ton of gold, and four-sevenths of the commerce of the world is done on the double standard or single silver standard.

Ever since the closing of our mints every President and every Secretary of the Treasury have refused to obey the statute under the Bland and Sherman acts for its purchase, have refused to pay it out, have declared officially and privately in and out of season that it was cheap, dishonest, and dangerous money, and yet the disinherited bullion stands to-day at 67 cents an ounce, and not an idle or surplus ounce in the world. Change the position of silver with gold, and could the latter metal excel this standing? It has been phenomenal.

The Government refuses to pay out silver in common with gold, as the President and Secretary of the Treasury say, to maintain the parity of the two metals. This directly destroys the parity. It increases the demand for gold and appreciates it, decreases the demand for silver and depreciates it, under the universal law of supply and demand.

The American people owe national, municipal, and private debts estimated at about $30,000,000,000. At 4 per cent interest it would require $1,200,000,000 to pay the annual interest. The greater portion of this was contracted when gold and silver were both legal-tender money, and all national bonds and greenbacks are by statute specially payable in either. The gold standard doubles the value of these obligations and is contrary to every principle of common honesty and makes a perpetual income class of coupon clippers in America. The specialists controlling our finances clamor continually for an international money with which to pay our debts and do our home business, which completely destroys our internal prosperity in the interest of the foreign and domestic bondholders and money lenders.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the adverse business conditions prevailing in 1892, under the McKinley law, contributed largely to the overwhelming defeat of Mr. Harrison. Gentlemen will remember the cyclone of disapproval which swept over this country from Maine to California. Why, even the eminent Speaker of this House, with his distinguished colleagues from Maine, only escaped the wreck made by that cyclone because they "got over the bridge" before it went down in November, 1892; and the bridge went down largely because of adverse trade conditions. It was the paralysis prevailing in business circles which compelled the Republican party to extend $25,000,000 of maturing Government bondsand take $54,000,000 of trust funds belonging to holders of national-bank notes and cover them into the general Treasury. All this occurred long before the election of Mr. Cleveland.

I quote from the debate which took place here just a few moments ago, using the official reporter's transcript:

Mr. CRISP. You recollect the stories that went through the press—I do not vouch for them—that already in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing they were preparing bonds to be issued to build up the gold reserve.

Mr. DOCKERY. Secretary Foster actually gave the order, now on file in the Treasury Department, for preparing the plates.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Missouri states that the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary Foster, actually issued the order. Mr. Secretary Foster, under the Republican Administration, not only——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me?

Mr. CRISP. I do not want to be interrupted in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I simply want to challenge the statement of the gentleman from Missouri.

Now then, in answer to the challenge of the gentleman from Ohio, I have obtained by special messenger from the Secretary of the Treasury the official order of Secretary Foster under date of February 20, 1893, in these words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1893.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and directed to prepare designs for the 3 per cent bonds provided in a Senate amendment to the sundry civil bill now pending. The denominations which should first receive attention are $100 and $1,000 of the coupon bonds and $100, $1,000, and $10,000 of the registered bonds.

This authority is given in advance of the enactment, in view of pressing contingencies, and you are directed to hasten the preparation of the designs and plates in every possible manner.

I inclose a memorandum for your guidance in preparing the script for the body of the bond.

Respectfully, yours. CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

THE CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Not only this, Mr. Speaker, but on page 70 of Special Report No. 2621, made to the House of Representatives by Mr. Springer, then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is a statement by Secretary Foster, of date February 25, 1893, in answer to questions by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. TURNER. It disclosed an unsatisfactory Treasury situation:

Mr. TURNER. Taking into consideration all these conditions which you anticipate, what, in your judgment, would be a fair conjecture of the condition of the Treasury at the end of the next fiscal year?

Secretary FOSTER. I should say the next fiscal year would show a deficit.

Mr. TURNER. Can you give an approximate estimate according to all the data accessible to you?

Secretary FOSTER. I will only say this, that if I was to have the management of the Treasury I should insist upon an increase of revenue to the extent of $50,000,000.

Mr. TURNER. In order to meet those conditions which you anticipate?

Secretary FOSTER. Not only those conditions, but the gold conditions as well.

In the same report, page 64, Secretary Foster said that the unfavorable conditions as to gold were so severe under the Sherman Act and from other causes that he gave the order to Mr. MacLennan (now chief of the division of bookkeeping and warrants, then chief of the division of warrants, bookkeeping, and estimates) to hold back for a day or two requisitions amounting to five or six millions of dollars. I have not time to read his testimony, but append it to my remarks.

So, Mr. Speaker, we find that the original outflow of gold from the Treasury of the United States was the effect of untoward trade conditions and of the passage of the Sherman Act, which, under the Treasury construction, resulted in an issue of $150,000,000 of gold obligations, with no gold in the Treasury to redeem them. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Extracts from testimony of Secretary Foster, February 25, 1893:

Mr. TURNER. But could you not bring that statement down for the basis suggested by Mr. MCMILLIN to include the year 1894?

Secretary FOSTER. He wants to see the difference in the manner of making the statements now and what formerly prevailed.

Mr. TURNER. And how the condition of the Treasury would appear each year since then on the basis of the former mode——

Secretary FOSTER. And how it would appear now on the basis of the former method of making up the accounts.

Mr. WILSON. What items in the Treasury are now covered in as available cash assets which were heretofore set apart as not under that heading?

Mr. MCMILLIN. And also what they amounted to when turned in?

Secretary FOSTER. Of course there is nothing turned in. Under the law we charged off as a liability against us about $5,000,000 on hand for redemption of national-bank notes which come in mutilated, and we charged that off as liabilities. We also charged off to liabilities the amount of outstanding checks, what we call agency accounts, which are largely post-office accounts. The Treasury in actual cash is always better off than a statement would make it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest, Mr. Secretary, without some of my colleagues would prefer a different date, for you to make the statement covering the 31st of December, and then we will have it in unison with the balance of the reports here.

Secretary FOSTER. All right. Under Mr. Manning the bank deposits were not considered as money in the Treasury; subsidiary silver was not, but if I eliminated those items now there would be a showing of deficit.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand you are keeping books according to law, and that this statement they used to make was not according to law.

Secretary FOSTER. I do not want to say that; I do not want to say that in regard to my predecessors.

Mr. WILSON. As I understand, Mr. PAYNE, according to law means when I get pretty hard pressed I can take trust funds and pass them to my account and take some of my obligations I have got on hand for sale and count them as sold.

Secretary FOSTER. It is not that; but the changes in the keeping of the statement are simply this: There were two items, one of money in banks and the other subsidiary coin, which were eliminated from the cash and were not called cash. Now, I got to a point where if I did not include them in my cash my statement would show a deficit. I thought they were cash. I can take every dollar out of these banks in a minute, and I believe I have reduced the deposit to about $10,000,000.

Subsidiary coin is now at a point where it is not a large factor, it is gradually coming down. In my time it was $23,000,000, and when we get the Chicago Fair appropriations paid it will be down to $9,000,000, perhaps just about a fair working balance, and in the course of about three years you will have to supply some more. But when my predecessors were handling it it was $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, and the real significance of these statements is what the Secretary at the time being wants to show. My predecessors had a great deal of money and they wanted to show it was as small as possible. I had little money and wanted to show it was as large as possible, and I did just exactly what brother Springer and you would have done if you had been in my place. There is no juggling of figures at all.

Mr. PAYNE. You went on to a point where, if you continued the old statement, it would have showed a deficit, but you still had plenty of money in the Treasury for all needs?

Secretary FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The Treasury was easy at that time?

Secretary FOSTER. Yes. The difficulty with the Treasury has not been any lack of money. It ought to have more money, but by the act of July 14, 1890, you have created an additional liability upon the gold in the Treasury of $130,000,000. That $100,000,000 was set apart as a redemption fund for $346,000,000 and it is now nearly $500,000,000.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Four hundred and seventy-six million dollars, I believe.

Secretary FOSTER. Now, there is a demand for this gold from abroad, and the truth is we owe the money and it is natural. My best information is that our securities are not coming back here; we are shipping securities abroad, but when you take into account the shrinkage of the balance of trade as shown upon the custom-house books compared with former years, and then deduct from that the balance of what our people spend abroad, say $120,000,000; $30,000,000 balance freight; $25,000,000 undervaluations (and I think it is probable we are cheated that much); $12,000,000 servant-girl funds sent abroad; (the balance on postal money orders is $12,000,000 against us); the Chinese send what money they have back to China; most of the money of the Italians goes back; 75,000 American citizens go abroad every year in the steerage who spend more or less money; all of these elements must be considered in determining the balance of trade. When you take all these elements into account you will find we owe money abroad.

Seeing these things, the Secretary felt that we should keep all the money we could in gold. About $25,000,000 was the limit he could pay for. He had no trouble to get gold if he had the money to get it with. Possibly, sometimes, when five or six or seven millions of requisitions would come in in a day, for which he would have to pay gold if all were paid in a day, I probably have suggested to Mr. MacLennan that he had better wait a day or two until we got in a better shape, because I did not want to pay out gold for current liabilities. I knew just as well as I was living that this thing was going to come, and I wanted to be as strong as I possibly could. So you see in my report I made as good a statement as I could of our condition, and asked you to give the Treasury more money, so this gold reserve might be increased. Now, since $21,000,000 of this gold has gone and I have but $4,000,000 left, I can pay any requisitions which come in promptly, because I have currency in the place of gold.

I merely make this explanation so you may know what the situation has been. This has not been for the want of money. Once in a while, when large requisitions come in and pile up together, I do not want to pay them, because I would have to pay them in gold, and so we would paddle along for a day or two, when some one would say the Treasury was bankrupt and all that sort of thing. Now, I commenced with $25,000,000 in gold in the Treasury when gold exports commenced in December; $35,000,000 have gone out of the country and we have $4,000,000 left. Now, more gold is going, I have no doubt. If the Secretary could have had $50,000,000 more money on the 1st of December he could have increased the gold to $150,000,000 and kept his reserve at about $125,000,000, but not having the money, he could not do it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the scenes that are being enacted here to-day illustrate in a marked manner the difference between the two great political parties of this country. Less than a week ago the President of the United States sent to this Congress a message stating that a great crisis was impending and recommending that the members of this House remain in session to provide some means or some method to avert the financial dangers that, in his opinion, were so imminent. Upon the reception of that message in this House the Republican members went into consultation as to the best means to aid the President in his effort to maintain the financial integrity of the country. Where, I ask you, is the Democrat in this House who by his voice or his vote has come to aid the Republicans in their patriotic effort?

If this measure, Mr. Speaker, that has been presented to this House is not such a measure as will meet the emergency, then I ask you, in the name of justice, why is it that the ex-Speaker of the House, the acknowledged leader of the Democratic party in the House, has not suggested some remedy of his own? Why is it, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] finds so many defects in the bill presented here by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, that he, with all his great experience in legislation and his ability from a Democratic standpoint, has not been enabled to offer some amendment in the committee or to make some suggestion upon this floor which would meet the emergency which the President says exists?

Mr. MCMILLIN. No amendment is allowed under the rule you have adopted. That is one thing that we complain of.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was in committee with the Republican members yesterday; he had an opportunity to make some suggestions, if he had any to make. Why is it that gentlemen on that side have waited until the Republican party formulated the bill which has been presented before taking any action in the premises? If they are patriots instead of partisans, if they desire to uphold the arms of their President in this great emergency, why have they waited until this time? Why did they not get together and formulate some measure? Why did they not come to the Republicans and say, "This is an emergency where partisanship should be sunk and patriotism should control"? Not a word is heard from them. They remain in the quiet of their rooms until the Republicans, sinking their party prejudices, formulate a bill not in accordance with the views entertained by the party to which I belong, and then they assume their old rôle of critics. They are in their proper place to-day, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Tennessee never appears so well as when he is kicking against some proposition or criticising some argument that is made on the opposite side. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely satisfied with the measure presented here for the consideration of this House; and it is only under the shadow of the great crisis which the President of the United States in his official message to us has stated to exist that I am willing to give it my approval. In an emergency like this, brought to our attention in so solemn a manner by the President, I feel that my convictions as a Republican should be modified, and I meet him more than halfway to avert the dangers that he says overhang the country. The measure that is presented here, while it is not a Republican measure, will, in my judgment, if it becomes a law, bring in enough additional revenue to the Treasury of the United States to make our revenues equal or exceed our expenditures. It will stop the endless chain that takes our gold from the Treasury, and will restore confidence to our people.

Mr. Speaker, this condition which confronts us to-day was not brought upon the people of this country by the Republican party. The ills to which the people have been subjected for the last two or three years are not the creation of the Republican members of this House or the Republican party of the country. When the Wilson-Gorman bill was first formulated in the Committee on Ways and Means the Republican members of that committee protested against its being reported to the House. They pointed out to the then leader of the House, Mr. Wilson, of West Virginia, its many inequalities, its many features of injustice to the great interests of the country, and its inadequacy to supply sufficient revenues for the Government. But the Democratic leaders of the House, regardless of the protests that were made by the members of that committee, overriding the prayers and entreaties of the manufacturers, the laborers, and producers who appeared before the committee and sought to have that bill modified, brought it in and passed it under their party whip and lash.

They were told at that time of all the evils that would come. As I have said, it is only necessary for us to recall the peaceful condition of affairs under the McKinley law and the Administration of President Harrison to realize the marked change that has been brought about in this country by Democratic inefficiency and blundering legislation. When the McKinley law was upon the statute books of this country we had peace, contentment, and prosperity throughout the land. Our manufacturing industries were successful beyond compare. America in those days was the paradise of the laboring man. Farmers and other producers received for their rich harvests and for their abundant products prices that made that a golden period indeed for them. This brief description of the condition of our country at that time portrays inadequately the facts. How is it now? The Wilson-Gorman bill, which we seek to amend in the interest of all alike, made "tramps" of a million of honest, industrious workingmen. It sent the wolf of hunger and want into the homes of our laboring classes. It destroyed the manufacturing industries of the country. It put out our furnace fires. It stifled the noise of the loom and the spindle. Not only that, but it nearly bankrupted our Treasury. This is what has been brought upon us by the legislation which we seek to remedy in the manner proposed by the bill before us. While, as I have said, I do not approve the bill in all its provisions, yet I do know that if it is adopted it will be one step in advance toward repairing the ravages under which the country and the American people have suffered by reason of Democratic incompetency and the Democratic reform legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I will ask the gentleman from Maine, inasmuch as my colleague, Mr. TURNER, will conclude the debate on this side, if he has reached that stage where the remaining time is to be used in closing by one individual? If so, my colleague will go on now.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is my purpose, I will say to my friend from Georgia, to yield to another gentleman, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, before concluding the debate on this side.

Mr. CRISP. My colleague will close on this side, and therefore if there are other gentlemen to speak on the side of my friend from Maine I hope he will allow the debate to continue on that side.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do you intend to give all of the time to your colleague?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, all the remaining time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has thirty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. DINGLEY. How much time remains on this side?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman propose to consume all of the time?

Mr. CRISP. My colleague proposes to consume it himself.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, the conclusion is to be retained on this side?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield my support to the measure pending before the House because it is, first, a revenue measure demanded by the President of the United States, or else the President of the United States is guilty of assault upon the integrity of the Treasury, which I can not lay at the door of an American President; and second, because in raising the sum of something like $40,000,000 which will be theproduct of this bill, that proportion of protection to the American producers will be gained by this legislation.

I will not stop here to discuss the direct and necessary effects of the bill upon the several branches of industry to be affected. I will leave that either to a future occasion or to such an extension of my remarks as I may see fit to make. I am unalterably in favor of protective duties. I believe that the products of the farm, the products of the mines, and the products of the factories of this country should all be protected by ample provision of law against the incursion of cheap-labor products into this country. And representing, as I do, an agricultural district, and especially a woolgrowing district, I greatly regret that something more substantial and more beneficial for those interests can not be obtained in this session. But I am one of those who believe in doing the best that I can under existing circumstances, and in recognizing the practical rather than the theoretical in politics. The woolgrowing interest of Ohio has been practically ruined by Democratic legislation. The producers of wool have become discouraged, and in large lot have sacrificed their flocks.

If this bill can be passed, which carries nearly 7 cents a pound duty upon the wools of Ohio, I have confidence to believe that it will be beneficial in two respects. First, it will be protective in itself to the extent of this duty, and second, it will encourage our sheep owners to hold on to their flocks with the assurance of better times in the near future.

Furthermore, the action of the House in favor of this bill will be admitted as a guarantee that protection to wool and agricultural products throughout is the settled purpose of the Republican party. The repeal of the McKinley law carried destruction to the best interests of the American people. If we can add to all the schedules of the bill that destroyed those interests an increase of 15 per cent and put upon this Schedule K of wool and wool products 60 per cent of the McKinley law, it certainly will be beneficial in both directions—beneficial in its immediate effects and beneficial in the assurance of our action in the future. So I take this as a mere tentative measure, and one that is a harbinger of the future.

I am delighted, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the leader of the Democratic side of the House, is anxious about the McKinley bill and the fortunes of that great leader of this American sentiment. He asks, if 60 per cent of the McKinley law was right, what has become of the 40 per cent? If the gentleman from Georgia should happen to straggle through the mazes of Georgia politics, and does not become engulfed in that rising tide that seems to be sweeping him off the field of future possibilities, and will come back here to the Fifty-fifth Congress, we will try to show the gentleman, and the people as well, where the 40 per cent of the law of 1890 is. [Applause on the Republican side.] It may be that we shall not want the whole 100 per cent on some items, for in the distress sweeping over the country under the Democratic rule changes have come, and it is likely that the interests of the country will demand that the measure which will be adopted in the Fifty-fifth Congress shall be builded upon new lines of taxation and not on the ancient landmarks which were necessary in the bills that have preceded.

The enemies of protection in this country have sought from time to time to see discord among the Republicans talking about McKinley schedules and McKinley rates. When the proper time comes I will call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to the fact that the Republican party will show itself not only loyal to protection and true to wisdom and good sense, but will frame its protective bill of the Fifty-fifth Congress upon lines incident to the conditions then, always, however, upon the basis of the true policy of protective tariff.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]—the gentleman from Georgia used language that brought about the statement of the gentleman from Missouri—to the true history of Republican financiering so far as any proposed issue of bonds in 1893 is concerned. The gentleman from Georgia was very cautious, but he used language which in fact was a statement that there was made necessary by the condition of affairs in the closing months of the Republican Administration, an issue of bonds, and thereupon the gentleman from Missouri states that which has been so often said and so often exploded, that an order had been issued by Governor Foster, Secretary of the Treasury, to make a plate for the use of a bond in February, 1893.

First, let me point out to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], who has attempted a comparison between the two Administrations, that it is an unfortunate suggestion of his that we should now institute a comparative statement between the two Administrations. During the Administration of Benjamin Harrison we paid off nearly $250,000,000 of the national debt and destroyed the bonds, and put an end to the necessity to relieve the country of that burden. Under Mr. Cleveland's Administration we have already increased the national debt, first, by one hundred and sixty-two and a half million dollars of bonds, bearing a high rate of interest, added to an additional floating debt or deficit, which present the sum total of about $2000,000, and within the next ten days it is safe to predict that that sum will be increased by another hundred million dollars of bonds. All these are the true elements of comparison which the gentleman from Georgia has entirely omitted to refer to.

Now, what was the truth in regard to the issue of bonds proposed by Secretary Foster? So soon as Mr. Cleveland was elected President of the United States in 1892 symptoms of distaess which then spread over the country made themselves manifest. Confidence was shaken, wages fell, enterprises took fright, business subsided, and the gold reserve began to be diminished and began to fall, and the danger line was reached. Shortly after, the Almighty, for some reason that the human intellect can not understand, afflicted this country with a Democratic victory in 1892. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] The high-water mark of prosperity in this country in every branch of industry was on the day when Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States, and all branches of prosperty began to depreciate at once. The gold reserve began to fall. It kept pace with the fall of industries. It kept pace with the fall of wages. It kept pace with the fall of enterprises, and it became apparent to the people of the country that something had to be done, and the Republican party in 1893 was the same patriotic party that it is to-day, and seeing the exigencies of the country, and seeing that the very presence of Mr. Cleveland, his very election, had stricken a deadly blow at the Treasury, Mr. SHERMAN introduced and tacked on—I state this from public rumor—at the request (and I state without qualification) by the acquiescene of the incoming prospective Secretary of the Treasury—a proposition to allow the issuance of certificates of indebtedness at a low rate of interests, to-wit, at 3 per cent, so that the incoming Democratic Administration might be enabled to sell a 3 per cent bond. The proposition, as I remember it, was practically and, I think, exactly the proposition now involved in the second section of the bond bill which will be brought before the House, perhaps, to-morrow.

I quote from a speech of Secretary Foster in the opening of the campaign at Senecaville, Ohio, this year. Governor Foster said:

WHAT THE HARRISON ADMINISTRATION DID.

Besides paying all the expenses of the Government, including enormous payment for pensions, payments much larger than have been paid before or will be paid hereafter, aggregating an excess of (approximately) $100,000,000 more than was paid by the first Cleveland or will be paid by his second Administration. It paid, also, all the extraordinary expenses for rivers and harbors and new Navy, and the other expenses of the "billion dollar Congress;" and in addition paid, including premiums, about $200,000,000 of the public debt. On the 4th of March, 1893, we turned over to the new Administration nearly $125,000,000 in cash, more than one hundred millions of which was gold.

Notwithstanding that Carlisle's statement shows the facts just stated, true to their habits and instincts, which have abided with them in the past and will no doubt continue in the future, they make these false allegations in the face of their refutation over the signature of their own Secretary.

THE TWO FALSEHOODS MOST PLEASING TO DEMOCRATS.

The two falsehoods that the Democratic leaders persistently publish, and in which they would take fiendish delight if true, are that American genius is incapable of producing tin plate and the Treasury under Harrison was bankrupt.

ORDERING PLATES FOR BONDS.

Now, as to the charge that the Secretary was so straitened for cash that he ordered plates for bonds to be prepared. I believed at that time that the gold reserve of one hundred millions should be maintained, and I would have sold bonds had this reserve fallen below the $100,000,000 limit to replenish it.

I believe now that much of the trouble that came to the Treasury could have been avoided if Secretary Carlisle had promptly announced that he would maintain his gold reserve at all hazards. I feared such a contingency might occur in my time. To fortify myself and be ready for such an emergency I conferred with capitalists and found I could sell bonds for gold on a basis of 3 per cent interest. The only bonds available were those authorized by the resumption act of 1875, none bearing interest at a less rate than 4 per cent. The plates for these bonds had been prepared while Mr. Sherman was Secretary, and quite a supply was already printed and ready for final execution. Mr. Carlisle, I suppose, used this class for delivery to the purchasers of bonds sold by him. About the 20th of March, 1893, the Senate, with the approval of Mr. Carlisle, who was then known to be the incoming Secretary, passed an amendment to an appropriation bill authorizing the issue of a 3 per cent bond by a practically unanimous vote. I had no doubt then that the House would concur, and that a 3 per cent short-term bond would be authorized. The emergency was such that I thought it prudent to direct the preparation of plates for these anticipated new 3 per cent bonds, which were in all respects a better bond than those authorized, for the use of myself or my successor at the earliest date possible.

The House failed to concur with the Senate amendment providing for a 3 per cent bond, and on the 4th of March I revoked the order for the preparation of plates; the plates were not completed and were not used by Secretary Carlisle.

THE ONLY PURPOSE FOR WHICH BONDS WERE TO BE SOLD.

The fact that my only purpose in contemplating a sale of bonds was to maintain the gold reserve at more than one hundred millions, and not in any sense to provide for current expenses, must be borne in mind. The revenues were ample, and continued so until July 1, three months after President Cleveland's Administration began. As the gold reserve did not fall below one hundred millions during the Administration of President Harrison (and did not for six weeks afterwards), there was no occasion for selling bonds, even upon the rigid views I held and still hold as to my duty. There was no occasion for the intervention of the President to prevent the sale of bonds.

This is the history of the whole affair, and proves that all there was of it was an honest effort on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, Governor Foster, a patriotic effort, a wise effort, the effort of a patriotic man to leave himself in such shape as that the crumbling credit of the United States, falling beneath the blows of Democratic accusation and power, might not be without remedy. That is all there is of it. That is all there ever was of it. The Republican party, going out of power, saw the storm coming up and, like a wise seaman, trimmed its sails to meet the coming storm before it struck the country. The Republican Administration of 1893 placed the financial ship of state in a position to weather the storm. Their efforts were futile. The storm struck the ship and we lost the country by the election of Cleveland and the Democratic Administration, and the cost to the country in money value has far exceeded the cost of the great rebellion. And so our proposition now is to raise only forty millions extra to supplement the falling of the Treasury, and we propose to make a provision so that the bond act of 1875 shall be no longer used in the reckless manner that it has been heretofore.

Referring again to the bill under consideration, it may not be a protective tariff bill; it certainly is not. Yet there is protection in it, and, best of all, there is protection against Democratic inefficiency, Democratic incompetency, Democratic blundering in all that they have done.

Gentlemen on the other side speak of the estimates of the Treasury Department and the hope they have that it will not be necessary to raise more money. I ask the gentlemen to point out to me one estimate made by the Treasury Department since 1893, beginning with the very first utterance of this Secretary of the Treasury, whether it related to the estimates of receipts or to the estimates of expenditures, and tell me when it was right, and tell me when it was that in a single instance his estimates have been found to be true. [Applause on the Republican side.] Look at the estimates of expenditures. They have all failed. Look at the estimates of receipts. See how he has divided them up. Not one of them has met the estimates. Not one of them was ever accurate. How can you ask the Republicans on this floor to take his estimates as the basis of anything which we shall do or fail to do? So far I have simply replied to the gentlemen on the other side.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] tells us that we are going to walk the plank again in obedience to the demands of the American people. I remember in the first session of the Fifty-third Congress how the gentleman gloried over the defeat of 1892, and told us that upon the passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill we should again walk the plank. The election came in 1894, and I heard a great many splashes in the water from the planks of political destruction. I heard our friends walking the plank in every State, and the screams of the dying and the gurgle of the drowning was the music of November, 1894. But the unfortunates were not Republicans. The unfortunates were Democrats, and were men who voted for the Gorman-Wilson bill. And indeed, I heard some clutching at a political plank in the State of Tennessee, not far from the district of my distinguished friend [Mr. McMILLIN]. I heard the clutching at the plank and the flying of the splinters in the air, and I learned that he had been barely saved. I advise him to be very careful that the plank which he has been talking about shall not be the plank upon which his overthrow in politics will take place in 1896. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am not vain enough to imagine that at this hour of the debate, when the ground has been so thoroughly covered by the distinguished gentlemen who have preceded me, I can, in the short time allotted to me, add anything that will be very striking or original; but I shall take advantage of the opportunity so kindly accorded to me to express my individual views with respect to the matter under discussion; and possibly I may be able to state briefly some of my reasons for supporting this measure, as well as to answer some objections that have been urged against it.

The Secretary of the Treasury has informed us in his recent report that there is no necessity for legislation of this character, that the skies are brightening, that the receipts of the Government are gradually increasing, and that the expenditures are slowly decreasing. He informs us further that there is in the Treasury of the United States about $50,000,000 of free money to bridge the chasm which he admits exists between the actual receipts and expenditures of the Government, and which he also concedes will probably exist at the end of the current fiscal year. Gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber, who seem to have no remedy of their own to suggest in the emergency by which we are confronted, taking their cue from the Secretary, repeat this argument of his upon this floor; but they do not see fit to inform us whether they are willing to follow him to the full extent of the reasoning in his report and vote to-morrow for a law to issue gold bonds with which to retire all of the greenbacks and all of the United States Treasury notes now in existence.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must be pardoned if we listen with incredulity to the Secretary of the Treasury in the predictions which he makes with reference to the future of the Treasury. We have tried him in the past and found that he was inaccurate. He told us that there would only be a deficit of $20,000,000 in the fiscal year 1894, and the deficit turned out to be $69,000,000. He prophesied that there would be a surplus in the year 1895, and it turned out that we had a deficit of $42,000,000.

He concedes now that there is a deficit of some $17,000,000 to date in the revenues for the current year. He tells us that his prophecy for the fiscal year 1895 would have been fulfilled but for the fact that the income tax was declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court and that the receipts from internal-revenue sources unexpectedly fell off; and so the receipts from internal-revenue sources may fall off in the future, Mr. Speaker, just as they have fallen off in the past, and the Secretary's present forecast turn out to be a bitter disappointment to those who put faith in it.

We are also told by the Secretary that there is enough money in the Treasury, which is free and unpledged for the redemption of any outstanding indebtedness of the country, with which to bridge over the chasm between the receipts and expenditures of the Government in the future; but, as has already been well observed on this floor, everybody knows that this balance consists of greenbacks, and that the moment they are paid out they can be at once presented again to the Treasury and used as the means by which to drain it of its gold; and yet, sir, it is this very thing—the draining of the gold reserve from the Treasury by means of our paper money—which the Secretary informs us is our greatest menace and to prevent which he urges the issue of bonds.

Mr. Speaker, large as the deficit is, it would have been still larger but for the fact that there has been niggardliness practiced in Congress in the appropriation of money with which to carry on the legitimate operations of the Government. For the last two Congresses scarcely a cent has been appropriated for the construction of public buildings, although many such have been needed, and the work upon public improvements already in course of construction has in many instances been suspended for lack of funds. Not daring to attempt the open repeal of the beneficent pension act of 1890, it has nevertheless been so administered, through narrow, technical, and unjust construction at the Pension Office, that many brave, patriotic, and deserving men have been deprived of the pension to which, under a proper and liberal construction of that law, they were entitled, and thereby the deficit has been diminished in amount. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Sir, while I am not in favor of prodigality, while I do not believe a surplus ought to be created simply to invite extravagant schemes of public plunder, yet I do insist that there should not be in the conduct of public affairs such parsimony as will cripple the Government, but a just and reasonable expenditure, and for this reason I believe there should be an endeavor made to put money into the Treasury to meet such expenditure, as is contemplated by the pending measure.

I will vote for this bill, too, sir, because it will tend to restore confidence. Much of the anxiety and confusion which has arisen in our financial affairs has grown out of the fact that there was known to be a deficit every month in the National Treasury. When there is no further deficit in the revenue you will likely restore confidence not only at home, but also abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let it be known to-morrow morning that the House has refused to come to the relief of the Treasury and you will find that the public anxiety will increase and the financial embarrassment will rapidly develop. The passage of this measure, sir, will turn the balance of trade in our favor, and thereby diminish to this extent the gold now drawn from our resources with which to liquidate the balance which is against us. To my mind, sir, the pending bill is a salutary one, and I shall therefore give to it my unqualified support. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I now yield to the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Chair whether in any way this bill is amendable in its present condition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no amendment is eligible under the rule.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a few historical facts which relate to our present condition may not be amiss on this occasion. When the party of President Harrison came into possession of the Government in all its branches his Democratic predecessor turned over to that Administration of available cash over and above the gold reserve $230,348,916.12. After four years of that Administration, and when again the party to which I belong succeeded to power in the White House, in this House and nominally in the other branch, or rather on the 1st day of March, 1893, we found in the Treasury, exclusive of the one hundred million reserve, a surplus of $62,450,575.18. And in order to show that balance there was a sort of jugglery with the figures.

Under the act known as the Sherman Act a trust fund of $54,000,000 and over deposited in the Treasury for the redemption of the national-bank notes was seized to make this balance. Taking the form of statement such as had existed before that time, or taking from this balance this bank-trust fund, we found in the Treasury when we succeeded to power in March, 1893, scarcely any surplus at all over the gold reserve. The surplus was gone and the bank-trust fund was converted into a debt. The previous Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and expressed the opinion that there should be added to the resources of the Treasury $25,000,000 in gold to replenish the redemption fund.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has just read a statement establishing the well-known fact that Mr. Foster near the close of his term prepared to supplement that gold reserve with an issue of a large amount of bonds. At that time we had had the full fruition of the McKinley Act. We had had the beneficent influence of protection under the leadership of that undaunted man, Mr. McKinley. We had had that system at the highest rate ever known in the history of this country, and yet the revenues ran down and the surplus had nearly disappeared, as was admitted by Mr. Foster in my presence.

With this empty Treasury, with the state of alarm existing in the country as to the integrity of our currency system, growing out of the Sherman silver act, with gold withdrawals already going on at a rate which gave Mr. Foster the greatest concern, and with the approach of that season of our commerce when these gold withdrawals were necessarily bound to increase—in that state of things, Mr. Speaker, we acceded to power. The new Congress, which was elected with Mr. Cleveland, revised the tariff in the interest of the Treasury as well as of the taxpayer. The revenue the McKinley Act had promised had run down, because that great measure of protection was a restriction upon importations and a prevention of revenue, as it was designed to be.

In the midst of a panic which threatened the credit of the Government itself and in the face of a depleted Treasury the party of which I am an humble member courageously went forward and said, "The remedy for the situation is not to raise taxes, but to lower them." [Applause on the Democratic side.] We said that we could increase the revenues of the Government by taking off the restrictions upon our commerce and at the same time lessen the burdens of the people. How have our anticipations been realized? Even after all the tribulations of the long session of the last Congress we finally passed a tariff measure which was not acceptable to me and not acceptable to many of my friends upon this side, but which we said would produce ample revenue for all the necessities of the Government. If the Supreme Court of the United States, that highest tribunal in the land, had not reversed its apparent attitude upon the question of the income tax and nullified that feature of the law, we would have had no deficiency at all at the beginning of next year.

Now, what has been going on under the customs features of that bill? Furnaces whose fires had been banked have resumed operations throughout the country, and they stand as witnesses to the correctness of the Democratic view. In every town, in every community, in every place where men manufacture American goods, almost without an exception, under the operation of that act, styled a "free-trade" act, wages have gone up, and at the same time one of its most glorious effects is that in spite of all the prophecies of ill, in spite of the desolating effects which were predicted for it, our exports of manufactured goods going out to sea and contending with our competitors in the markets of the world have actually increased by more than $17,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I hope my friend will not interpose here. I have but a brief time.

Mr. WELLINGTON. The gentleman says that wages have gone up all over this country, from Maine to California. I want to remind him——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman can not remind me. I know as much about the matter as the gentleman does. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me add to this brief statement another fact. The defeat of the income tax made a deficiency, but there is actually no deficiency in the Treasury. According to the last printed statement, which I received this morning from the Secretary of the Treasury, there is in the Treasury over $170,000,000 of surplus, including the gold reserve. Why should we, in the face of these facts and in view of the history which I have briefly recited, reverse our policy and take from the people, by taxation, still more of their hard-earned money when the Treasury does not need it? I heard my ingenious friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] when he attempted just now to justify that course, but I confess I have not yet been able to understand his contention.

We have more money in the Treasury than we need; why, then, should we want to put more of the same kind of money there? I have here a statement from the Treasury showing the form in which our customs duties have been paid during the last few days. From this statement it appears that not a cent of gold has been paid into the Treasury, not a gold certificate has been paid into the Treasury, not a cent of anything has been paid into the Treasury under our customs laws but greenbacks and Sherman notes. Why, I ask, should gentlemen seek by another tax levy to pile up in the Treasury forty millions more of this same kind of money, which will no more relieve the situation than the money of which we have already a surplus of over seventy millions?

But, sir, gentlemen to commend this bill claim for it magnanimity on their part. They assume that they are coming to the relief of this Administration. The Administration declines it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, there lies behind this measure a motive which is not apparent on its face or in the avowals made by its friends and champions on the other side. My friend from Tennessee adverted briefly to the motive which directs this measure. It is proposed by this measure to put the tariff question behind for the session. What has come over the "grand old party" that its chieftains dare not meet responsibilities on their own account? What is it that has induced them to tent on our abandoned camp grounds? [Laughter.] This is a bill which treats in a special way, with a sort of popgun policy, one or two articles; and you ought to send by express an apology to William M. Springer, among the savages in the Indian Territory. [Laughter.] You denounced that great Democratic statesman, William R. Morrison, for a horizontal bill, as has been said here; yet you have to-day simply adopted his policy, and you ought to send a resolution of thanks to him for having instituted a policy which you are copying here in a great emergency.

And, sir, as was also stated by my friend who preceded me, this is a bill which is claimed by the gentlemen advocating it to be a bill "for revenue only." In view of the history of this country since 1876, you ought to apologize to the Democratic party and the whole world. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I again ask you what has come over the spirit of the "grand old party"? When I first came to Congress I heard one of the gentlemen, now supported by his friends for the highest office in the gift of the American people, declare that he was for a tariff for protection with incidental revenue. He afterwards gave to the tariff which was constructed strictly on that principle the benefit of his name. You say you can not afford to enter now on general legislation. Why can you not follow his lead? He was once a doughty champion in your cause.

If, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, the existing law is wicked and iniquitous, why did you not in two or three sentences provide that the existing law be repealed and the McKinley Act reinstated? It would have taken but a few words, and it would have brought into the ranks all the followers of protection. But you do not do that. You see fit not to adopt the policies of your own distinguished men. You repudiate their leadership. You go back on all your own traditions, and you misapply and pervert devices of ours that we have long since repudiated. If you did not see fit to repeal the Wilson Act and reenact the McKinley law, why did not my good friend from Maine, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, offer here a bill to tax beer $1 a barrel more—a proposition which he favored during the last Congress? On this one item alone he could have raised nearly all the money which he now expects to raise by a tax on the necessaries of the American people; and it would not in any degree have disturbed the business of the country.

Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that after distinguished Democrats have been by Republican orators here and elsewhere accused of dreadful crimes and combinations in connection with the sugar-trust scheme in the present law, the gentlemen on the other side have simply passed over that so-called iniquitous feature without touching it up or touching it down? [Applause.] They have simply followed their denunciation of that scheme by letting it severely alone. Senators were put under investigation on account of it, and the President also came in for some share of abuse in this connection; but this bill stays its hand at the sugar schedule!

Why is it, if the Wilson tariff act is bad, that this bill does not attempt to correct its wickedness? Where is the courage of that great party? Even during the last Congress, as during all my service here, there sat on that side a man from whom a stern look was like the frown of offended majesty. There was on that side a courageous hand the mere motion of which could put down or put up every member on that side. That same hypnotic hand, once so potent in action, now silences associates and represses their ardor while it wields the gavel of this House. [Laughter and applause.] I think it is wise in him. I think he will rejoice still more at the end of two years from now than he did at the end of the last four years if he can congratulate himself on having suppressed a reagitation of the tariff during his primacy in this Congress. But the country will take up this battle.

Why, Mr. Speaker, so far as I remember, during my entire career in Congress I have never before seen that party decline the gage of battle. I never before knew them to deliberately turn their backs when we challenged them to the old breastworks. [Applause.] They are scarred and maimed in the cause of protection. They have carried its flag on a hundred hard-fought fields; but in this, the culminating hour of their fate, instead of hoisting again the old flag of the old party, they run in here a popgun, horizontal, revenue-only bill. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, among the stout-hearted champions of protection hitherto I have seen courage, confidence, ability, and all the qualities that constitute magnificent leadership. "But the age of chivalry is gone; that of sophisters, economists, and calculators has succeeded." [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, this horizontal bill adopts, except in one schedule, the Wilson bill, with all its alleged iniquities, as its base.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania stood up just now and revived that old contention about cotton ties. I have fought on that field with him many a time. It is an old issue. It is a matter about which I have had deep convictions. He calls the present provision on that subject a great iniquity. I want to tell him that, while the Wilson bill put cotton ties on the free list, the manufacturers of this country are still able to hold the cotton-tie market against the world. [Applause.] And in my opinion so it would be if we were to put almost everything in the iron schedule upon the free list. These enterprising Yankee manufacturers—I use the word not as a term of reproach—would under free trade be able not only to hold this market against the world, but to invade, not with the horrors of war, but in the pursuit of peaceful commerce, the mother country, and to take charge of her markets with very many of our iron and steel products. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that this bill is not now amendable. That means, of course, that nobody here can offer any proposition to change a single feature of it. I for one would be especially glad to amend a few iniquities. [Applause.] And, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if revenue were needed to again show that we can supply it abundantly, not by raising rates, but by lowering them [applause on the Democratic side]; and in that manner bring to the Treasury more than the gentleman from Maine contemplates in this bill. [Continued applause on the Democratic side.] But it can not be permitted to-day.

Now, I tell you that you yourselves have adopted a measure which you will be glad to amend before you vote for it. We can not, and you will need to have our unanimous consent before you will be able to do it yourselves. The bill presented by the gentleman from Maine in several sections refers to the act which it avers became a law on the "27th day of August, 1894." As the basis of the bill, it specifies in the first and second sections "An act which became a law on the 27th day of August, 1894." The next section concludes with the same reference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the House that no tariff act ever became a law on the 27th day of August, 1894. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Pass it, then, if you will; but it refers to a fact which did not exist. The so-called Wilson Act became a law on the 28th day of August, 1894. [Renewed laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And this is but a fair sample of the rash and inconsiderate way of treating so important a proposition as a tariff bill. You do not even correctly cite the law you propose to supersede. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. But this is an "emergency" law. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend from Mississippi on my right suggests that this is an emergency law. I beg to add that a bill which proposes to inflict a burden of seventeen millions more to the general list of taxes and twenty-seven millions more upon the clothing of the plain people of the United States, a measure which adds more than $44,000,000 to our load on the basis of our last year's imports, and still more to the burdens that we are carrying for the benefit of protection, ought to receive at least something like deliberate consideration in committee and upon the floor of the House; and while we are called upon to vote for or against it, we ought to have some opportunity to propose and consider amendments in this House, which has the sole power to lay taxes upon the people. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the gentleman from Georgia exhausted his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE in the chair). The gentleman from Georgia has two minutes remaining.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I believe there was an agreement that I was to close the debate. I suppose the time might be considered as exhausted.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. ARNOLD].

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we in supporting this measure are only performing a patriotic duty. There is no "party whip," as stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]; the crack of the lash was always a discordant and repulsive sound to Republican ears. The Republican party knows no master but the American people; neither have we any "cuckoos" in our ranks. On another occasion (in the Fifty-first Congress) the gentlemen on the other side said we were ruled by a czar; but soon thereafter the gentleman from Georgia and his associates wove the wreath that crowned the alleged czar as the peerless prince of parliamentarians. [Applause.]

A very few days ago the President sent us the message pertaining to the Venezuelan question, and all Republicans, joined by our Democratic friends on the other side, promptly, without a dissenting voice, passed the bill to provide for the expenses of the commission suggested by the Executive. This measure grew out of the reassertion of the Monroe doctrine. In this the President only recognized the patriotic spirit of the American people, which he has so slowly learned. By passing that measure we all, Republicans and Democrats, voted to call a halt on the selfish aggression of England. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration demands the support of all of us again, because it is another blow at English interests. Be consistent, my Democratic friends, and vote with us. [Laughter.]

But the gentlemen on the other side say there is no deficiency and no need of revenues. I refer them to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, page 52, wherein he states that the expenditures exceed the receipts from July 1, 1893, to December 1, 1895, over $130,000,000. How the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] can arrive at the conclusion that there is no deficit it is difficult to understand, and it can only be explained by believing that he calculates from the Treasury reports with the same peculiar system of mathematics which he applies to the silver question, namely, that the one-half of one hundred cents is one dollar. [Laughter and applause.] For months and months and many months the deficit has been millions per month, and this is known to all people who read. Your Wilson-Gorman bill of the Fifty-third Congress is not one of "tariff for revenue only," but a tariff for deficit only. So your revenue and financial measures are absolute failures, and you are continuing in that pathway, which has all along been strewn with the wrecks of your failures and with the evidences of your incompetency. All this now being history, you on the other side should thank and support us when we propose to help you in your extremity of threatened bankruptcy.

When the revenues are sufficient the financial question will settle itself, and therefore let us address ourselves to our plain duty and pass this bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has said to-day in his remarks that this is a tariff measure, and threatens that, if passed, "there is a power who will stop it." This threat will not deter us from our duty to the country; we will pass this bill, and with it we will pass the responsibility to the President. But this is not a tariff bill—it is only a revenue measure; after March 4, 1897, he will know what a Republican tariff bill really is, and then there will be no danger of the Executive vetoing it. [Applause.]

Then we will, in truth, provide a home market for our products and for the laboring man, and though he may be required to pay 1 cent more for a dinner bucket, he will have plenty to put in that bucket. Amid the sweet harmony of roaring furnaces, whirling looms, hammering forges, and buzzing sawmills happiness will then come to the home of the laborer, who will be fully employed at fair wages, and peace and plenty and prosperity will be constant guests at every fireside throughout this land. [Applause.] But the deficit, great as it is, would have been much greater had not the Democratic Administration used every ingenuity to keep it down. Think of the many pensions which have been cut off entirely in grossest injustice; the many pension claims, wherein the testimony has long since been complete, which are held back and not granted; and the many granted at a much less rate than the testimony shows them entitled to. Think of it, my countrymen, that the brave "soldier boys" of this nation, who gave most that life is worth living for that this Union might be preserved, are thus deprived of their just dues—many in the clutches of disease and want—that some excuse may be made for the free-trade Democracy. The soldier's pension is not a charity or gratuity, but rises to a higher plane of earned compensation and patriotic duty. God pity the party which thus denies, and not only denies, but forgets, the "brave boys in blue." [Applause.]

This measure will repair a little of the great evil that has come upon us; it will aid the laboring man some, and he needs all we can give him. We must not forget that a long step is taken toward communism, if not anarchy, when you deprive a man of the opportunity of earning bread for his family. The sons of toil of this land ask not for charity, but only for the opportunity of labor at fair wages, and these we demand they shall have. The Wilson-Gorman Democratic bill has signally failed, and it would degrade our labor to that of European pauper labor.

The Republican party stands committed to the protection of American labor, and will not follow England's free-trade policy which is protected at the mouth of the cannon. England has ever been a robber; she opens foreign markets by extending her commerce, and holds those markets by physical force. Might is right with her, and weaker peoples have often been required to yield territory to her because of her brute force. It is high time a halt were called. Let us have no more legislation in her interest, such as the Wilson-Gorman bill.

It is pleasant to know that the end of Democratic rule is near at hand—consistent in their inconsistencies, and most competent in their incompetency. But incompetency is a failing, not a fault, and it were, indeed, cowardly to attack the present Administration. [Applause.]

That knowledge is most valuable which is distilled over the fire of experience, and with such knowledge the American people will, in November, 1896, make provision to hand over to the Republican party—the party of principle, prosperity, and protection—full control of every department of this Government. Then will the Wilson-Gorman bill be repealed; that measure which can be fairly designated, with authority, as the child resulting from the union of "party perfidy and party dishonor." And no wonder, with such degraded parentage, the child is disgraced and disgraceful! [Laughter.]

And the financial methods of the Cleveland Administration are as discreditable as the revenue law it placed upon the statute books. Think of its selling $62,000,000 of 4 per cent gold bonds at $1.04 to a syndicate which made $10,000,000 profit in the transaction. Mr. Speaker, up in my State, in that city of brotherly love, business integrity (and I may add, parenthetically), beautiful women—Philadelphia—Mayor Warwick issued and sold to his own people $1,250,000 of bonds at 3 per cent interest, at par, and no syndicate or other person got one penny in commission. And the Pennsylvania Railroad Company negotiated lately a large loan at 3½ per cent interest at par. All this was accomplished by competent business management, while this great nation must pay 4 per cent, and in addition give $10,000,000 to negotiate $62,000,000. And with this fact in his possession the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] a few moments ago compared the present Secretary of the Treasury to Alexander Hamilton, the most versatile genius our country has ever produced. Shades of Hamilton, what profanation! "Pigmies are pigmies still on mountain tops, and pyramids are pyramids in vales." [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I take this opportunity, under leave of the House to print remarks on the bill under consideration, to state that had amendments to the bill been allowed I should have offered an amendment inserting the following as a sugar schedule:

That from and after the passage of this act and until August 1, 1898, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all sugars and on all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, a duty of 50 per cent ad valorem, and upon all sugars above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and upon all sugars which have been discolored there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the said duty of 50 per cent ad valorem; and all sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete or concentrated molasses which are imported from or are the product of any country which at the time the same are exported therefrom applies, directly or indirectly, a bounty on the export thereof, shall pay a duty of one-tenth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the foregoing rates: Provided, That the importer of sugar produced in a foreign country the Government of which grants such direct or indirect bounties may be relieved from this additional duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, in case said importer produces a certificate of said Government that no indirect bounty has been received upon said sugar in excess of the tax collected upon the beet or cane from which it was produced, and that no direct bounty has been or shall be paid: Provided further, That there shall be paid from the duties collected on sugar under the provisions of this act the sum of one-half of 1 per cent per pound on all sugar testing above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, to any person or persons who, from sugar manufactured by him or them from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, shall cause such sugar to test as aforesaid, under rules and regulations as to license, bond, supervision, inspection, and manufacture which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands on the 30th day of January, 1875, or the provisions of any act of Congress heretofore passed for the execution of the same.

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on molasses testing above 40° and not above 56° polariscope a duty of 2 cents per gallon; if testing above 56° polariscope, a duty of 4 cents per gallon.

Sugar candy and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 35 per cent ad valorem; glucose, or grape sugar, 15 per cent ad valorem; saccharine, 25 per cent ad valorem.

That so much of the act entitled "An act to reduce revenue, equalize duties, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, as provides for and authorizes the issue of licenses to produce sugar, and for the payment of a bounty to the producers of sugar from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, or from maple sap produced within the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and hereafter it shall be unlawful to issue any license to produce sugar or to pay any bounty for the production of sugar of any kind under said act.

This is the only schedule under the present tariff law which is omitted from the proposed bill as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and I am at a loss to understand how a revenue-producing article like sugar should be omitted from a revenue measure, conceded by all to be an emergency bill.

When we consider that this Government, from its foundation, has relied upon sugar as an article from which liberal revenue can be quickly and certainly realized, and that prior to the tariff act of 1890 the revenue from sugar exceeded $50,000,000 annually, and the fact that this bill is based on a horizontal increase of rates on every schedule except that of sugar, I can not comprehend why it is not included in this measure.

The amendment proposed by me increases the present duty of 40 per cent on all sugars to 50 per cent, which is a decrease of 5 per cent below the rate of general increase provided by this bill.

The only further change in the present law suggested by this amendment is as follows:

Provided further, That there shall be paid from the duties collected on sugar under the provisions of this act the sum of one-half of 1 cent per pound on all sugar testing above No. 16 Dutch standard in color to any person or persons who, from sugar manufactured by him or them from beets, sorghum, or sugar cane grown in the United States, shall cause such sugar to test as aforesaid, under rules and regulations as to license, bond, supervision, inspection, and manufacture which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The present duty of one-eighth of 1 cent a pound on refined sugar, and the one-tenth differential additional thereon from foreign countries paying an export bounty, remains unchanged by my amendment.

Briefly stated, the effect of this amendment, as a whole, would be an additional revenue to the Treasury of about $10,000,000, less the amount which would be paid our domestic producers who manufacture and refine their own product. This would approximate $2,000,000.

There could have been but one objection to my proposed amendment, and that would probably have come from the sugar trust. It would operate to deprive the trust of about $8,000,000 of its annual profits, which would find its way into the Treasury.

The cost of foreign raw sugar for refining purposes is under 2¼ cents per pound, which, with the present duty on it of 40 per cent ad valorem (1 cent) and one-eighth of a cent cost of refining, makes refined sugar cost the trust 3⅜ cents a pound, the selling quotation for which is 4⅜ cents per pound, showing a profit to the trust of 1 cent a pound on the 3,500,000,000 pounds which it refines annually, giving it $35,000,000 of profit.

Under my proposed amendment, to the cost of foreign sugar for refining, 2¼ cents, add duty on it at 50 per cent ad valorem (1¼ cents) and one-eighth of 1 cent for cost of refining, making the total cost of refined sugar to the trust 3⅜ cents per pound, which, deducted from the quoted New York price of refined sugar (4⅜ cents), leaves the trust a profit of only six-eighths, instead of 1 cent, a pound.

On this (six-eighths) basis its profit on its refined product, 3,500,000,000 pounds, would be $26,250,000 annually, instead of $35,000,000. The two-eighths or quarter of a cent a pound difference amounts to $8,750,000.

From the duty paid on sugars under my proposed amendment the one-half cent a pound will be paid to our domestic producers and farmers, amounting to $2,000,000, leaving a net revenue to the Treasury of nearly $8,000,000.

I am unable to perceive why this proposition in favor of revenue for the Government and protection for our domestic sugar producers and farmers should not have the favor of this Congress.

Mr. DANFORD. This bill is possibly a little better than nothing, and with that view of it I will give it my support.

I would have been greatly gratified to have had the privilege of testing the sense of this House upon an amendment to the wool schedule on the lines of House bill No. 2623; also, an amendment to the pottery schedule increasing the rate of duties and correcting errors in the schedule; also, an amendment increasing the tariff on tin, so as to make the schedule conform more nearly to the present iron and steel schedule; but these amendments are precluded by the rule under which we are considering this bill, and, while the bill is far from satisfactory to me in its present form, I will not for that reason vote against it, believing that it is better to pass the bill in its present form than to pass no bill.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which fixes 60 per cent of the duties under the McKinley law, is not such a measure as meets my entire approval. It seems to me that the Republicans are not called upon to yield their convictions concerning a protective tariff to the end that the President, who is a recognized opponent of protection, may be induced to give the measure his approval. If Mr. Cleveland is unwilling to approve of a properly constructed tariff bill on the lines of protection, then leave the results with him, and he should bear the responsibility of an insufficient revenue to meet the demands of his Administration.

The greatest danger, in my opinion, which threatens the country from the passage of this unsatisfactory tariff bill is that it may fix the measure upon the industries which need greater protection than this bill affords, a permanency which is not contemplated in the minds of a majority of the Republicans who will vote for this bill. After the bill goes into operation and business shall be adjusted to it, many reliable protective tariff men in all parts may doubt the propriety of another change in the duties imposed upon imported commodities.

In my opinion we ought to tender Mr. Cleveland a just and satisfactory tariff bill and leave the results with him. The people of the United States have three times since his election repudiated Democratic theories and practices; and I firmly believe that nothing contributed so much to the complete overthrow of the Democratic party as did its position on the tariff question.

But whether I approve of this bill or not I think I shall vote for it. I am unwilling to even seem to oppose any measure which may possibly afford any benefits to the vast industries of the people of this country. The suffering and distress which have been so general throughout the whole country since the Democratic party came into power in 1893 appeal to our patriotism, and therefore I shall vote for this insufficient protective tariff measure in the hope of increasing the revenues of the Government and affording some increased protection to American industries and opening up additional avenues of employment to workingmen. And although this bill tends to place the Republican party in a false position concerning protection, I am glad to hear gentlemen who brought in this bill openly declare on the floor of this House that the bill in no sense represents the views of the Republicans of this House. They inform us that this bill is only a temporary measure, and that when the Republicans get control of the executive and legislative departments of the Government we shall enact a tariff law which will afford adequate protection.

Accepting the statement of these eminent gentlemen, I shall expect a wiser and more acceptable measure in the near future, one that will meet the demands of the times as effectually as the McKinley bill did the needs of the people in 1890.

Give the country such a just and comprehensive bill and there will be another period of prosperity which will afford relief to the producers, manufacturers, and laborers in all branches of our industries. This is the one great object which should command our very best efforts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the contention of the Republican party on this floor is that the present bill has been introduced for the purpose of raising additional revenue to supply an alleged deficiency. The short space of time allotted to the minority in which to examine the provisions of the bill has prevented us from examining the rates of each article upon which a change is proposed. The present duty on pig iron is $4 a ton. I represent the principal manufacturing district in the Southern States, and in that district within the last year pig iron has been sold by our manufacturers free on board the cars at Birmingham for $5.75 a ton. This is nearly $2 less than the tariff duties levied under the McKinley bill. With iron selling at $5.75 or $6 a ton, the present duties amount to a prohibitive tariff, and an increase of rates on an article that is at present almost entirely prohibited from importation into this country can not increase the revenues derived from that article. This may not be true of other articles on which the increased tariff tax is levied, but it shows that the hasty preparation of this bill may reduce the amount of income derived from many articles from which we now derive some revenue, instead of increasing them, and that the real purpose of the bill is to increase taxation by a protective tariff system, and not for the purpose of relieving the deficit in the Treasury.

It has been contended on the floor of the House that the Wilson bill has caused great loss to our manufacturing interests throughout the country and loss of work to those persons engaged in manufacturing in this country. As far as the district that I represent is concerned, the opposite has been the case. During the summer of 1894, before the repeal of the McKinley tariff bill, a large majority of the manufacturers in the Birmingham district were "out blast" and a large number of men were out of employment. After the repeal of the McKinley bill and the enactment of the Wilson bill, during the fall of 1894 and the winter of 1895, the furnaces in the Birmingham district commenced to go into blast, until at the present day instead of there being a large number of men out of employment all of the furnaces of this district are in operation except six, and four of these six are prevented from going into operation by reason of litigation in which they became involved prior to the enactment of the Wilson bill. Instead of a reduction of wages, as is claimed by the Republican members on the floor of this House, the wages of the laborers employed in the coal mines, iron-ore mines, and furnaces in the Birmingham district have been increased 25 per cent. These are facts and not theories, and go to show that where manufacturing industries are located at advantageous points a protective tariff is not necessary for their prosperity.

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that while this bill does not go as far as I should like upon some of the schedules, such as wool, lumber, coal, and pottery, and I should like also to see tin plate included and all of these articles protected by the provisions of this bill as provided by the act approved October 1, 1890, known as the McKinley Act, yet as this has been called an emergency bill, and no amendments allowed under the provisions of the rule governing the consideration of the bill, and believing something should be done at once under the appeal made by the President in his message, as a patriotic duty, I believe in sustaining him and providing revenue sufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government, trusting that later on we shall have the privilege of voting on a measure of revenue which shall come up to my ideas of tariff, which will not only furnish revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government, but pay the interest on and pay off annually a part of the bonded debt, as well as protect American labor and every American industry in the land needing the same. Therefore I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this bill as a temporary means of replenishing our National Treasury. The President has warned this House by special message that the Treasury of the Government is in a dangerous condition, and that immediate relief is necessary to prevent, perhaps, another dangerous financial panic. To afford the relief which the President asks is the duty of Congress, and to that end I am willing to vote for this measure and contribute what I can to prevent what might result in financial disaster to the nation.

As a tariff measure, I do not think the bill meets the requirements of the country or that it will bring the relief to the prostrated industries of the nation which they deserve or which they have the right to expect from this House, or that it fully and sufficiently meets the demands of the Republican party or the promises made to the people by the representatives of that party in this House. As an emergency revenue measure, I support the bill. As a tariff measure, it does not meet my full approval.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. I desire to occupy some time in the debate on the bond bill which is expected to be reported to the House to-morrow. I yield the time allotted to me this afternoon to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent from the debate on this bill that it chiefly concerns the wool and woolen interests.

The district which I have the honor to represent is more largely interested in the woolen industry than any other in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and there are corporations there which individually consume more wool and produce more worsted goods than any other single corporation in the United States.

It is with a good deal of hesitancy that I vote for a bill relating to such important interests and which affects them to such an extent as this bill does. I should prefer time for consideration and thought. Why, then, am I called upon to vote for this bill, and why am I going to vote for it? It is because there is a financial exigency in the affairs of this Government that calls for relief.

Who says there is a financial exigency existing? The President of the United States. Who created that exigency? The Democratic party, whose representative he is. And it is because of that exigency that I am going to vote for this bill.

The woolen industry was prosperous under the McKinley bill, but those engaged in that industry shared that prosperity with the whole country. It was not a sectional prosperity. All others were prosperous. Under the present bill the chief prosperity has been enjoyed by the men who import foreign goods and export American gold.

Having shared in the general prosperity, Mr. Speaker, we have shared very seriously in the adversity. With that adversity upon us, what do we wish? We should like to have a general revision of the tariff. We should like to have it revised in the interest of the whole country and all its industries. But we know we must wait for about two years, and what do we desire in the meantime? We desire peace, commercial repose, a chance for the business industries of the country to adjust themselves to the changed conditions. But we can not have this peace, we can not have this repose, for the reason, it is said, there is an exigency now for more revenue for the Government. Aside from that, we are going to look for the increase where the loss was made, to the tariff which was destroyed by Democratic legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. I prefer to yield the time back to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now ask the other side to conclude what they have to say in the discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to surrender his time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the whole time on that side been used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the Chair indicate how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. To this side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; it was stated when the gentleman from Georgia concluded that he had two minutes remaining. He stated that he was to close the debate upon that side, and that he surrendered the time. So there is no time remaining on that side.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield fifteen minutes, or the remainder of the time on this side, to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. CRISP. There can not be fifteen minutes remaining on that side, for we take a vote at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very well; at 5 o'clock the vote will be taken.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, there is much in what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] has said as to the hurry and anxiety with which this bill has been prepared. He ought not, however, even in the midst of such remarks as he has made to the House, to lay upon the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means any responsibility for such a blunder in the date of the act of 1894 as that to which he has called the attention of the House. The act of 1894, for reasons which the Democratic party at least ought to appreciate, was not signed by the President of the United States, and it appears upon the statute book without his signature, with the annotation at the beginning of it that the date of it is August 27, 1894. [Applause on the Republican side.] If that is not the true date of the act of 1894, it only indicates that the State Department is mixed up with the general incompetency that has marked the present Administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. It only shows that my friend did not thoroughly investigate the subject for himself.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand that. If we can not rely upon the Statutes at Large published by a Democratic Secretary of State, where on God's footstool ought we to go for information? [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. It does not make any difference, anyway.

Mr. DOLLIVER. It makes little difference, anyhow, and I am sorry that my friend [Mr. TURNER of Georgia], whose argument is usually respectable at least, should have descended to a criticism of that character.

My friend starts out with the proposition that all the misfortunes that have come upon the country since the election of 1892 came by reason of the law that was in force at that time. He does not deny that instantly after the election of that year the American people found themselves in the midst of bankruptcy and poverty and business calamities the like of which was never visited upon an American community before. He says to this House and the country that all these evils came from the tariff law of 1890; that is to say, he asks us and the American people to believe that we had been plundered and robbed and burdened for so many years by the Republican policy that we put ourselves into the hands of a receiver the very moment it became certain that relief was at hand, a situation which will not, according to my judgment, commend itself to the common sense of the American people. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman says that, notwithstanding all we have seen and know, we are in the midst of a general revival of prosperity; that wages have increased in all parts of the country, and that all these blessings we owe to the tariff law of 1894.

I do not propose to enter into a controversy on the subject of protection. Everybody must judge that for himself; but I do say that my Democratic friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] ought to be very careful about attributing any very great amount of American prosperity to the operation of the law of 1894. If the American people can be persuaded of that it will do more to popularize perfidy and dishonor than anything that has ever happened in this world. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

My friend asks the Republican majority why we do not bring in a general tariff law, and he refers to the leadership of this House as wanting in courage; but the leadership of this House can always be relied on not to "fight as one that beateth the air." But we know, and everybody knows, that a Republican tariff law can not be enacted by this Congress. We do not know that the President of the United States would not sign the present bill. Does my friend speak by some commission when he says that the Administration declines this relief? We have the best reason for knowing that this law will please the present Chief Magistrate. We had a letter from the President in the last session of Congress which contains evidence that he will sign this law, restoring a reasonable revenue duty upon wool; and if my friend will listen to me I will read exactly what he says. He says:

> In these circumstances it may well excite our wonder that Democrats are willing to depart from this most Democratic of all tariff principles and that the inconsistent absurdity of such a proposed departure should be emphasized by the suggestion that the wool of the farmer be put on the free list and the protection of tariff taxation be placed around the iron ore and coal of corporations and capitalists.

The present law leaves a duty upon iron ore and coal substantially equivalent to 60 per cent of the law of 1890.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I make a suggestion?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I would say that he misconstrues the letter.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have not read it all.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The President meant to say that the duty on woolen goods should be reduced.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He spoke of the wool of the farmer; and now I want to impress on the Democratic side what he said:

> How can we face the people after indulging in such outrageous discriminations and violations of principle.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

With all his eloquence and all his ability the gentleman from Georgia can not explain how this great agricultural interest of the country was put on the free list, while 60 per cent of the McKinley rate was retained upon iron ore and coal. So I say that there is no man who knows the heart of the President as it has been revealed to us in these delicate communications we have had from the throne. [Laughter.] Who is authorized to say that he will put the signature of his Executive disapproval upon this bill for the relief of the Treasury? [Applause on the Republican side.]

My friend says the Treasury is in no danger and in no difficulty. On a question like that facts are more serviceable than mere opinions. From the day the act of 1890 went into effect up to and including October, 1892, there was a surplus of receipts in the Treasury over current expenditures. There has not been a quarter from that time until this hour when the receipts of the Treasury, compared with expenditures, have not shown a deficit. The shortage has averaged four millions and a half a month, more than seventy millions in aggregate, and if there is any man who believes that the Treasury of the United States can be permanently maintained upon a basis like that he may get the reputation of being a great statesman, but I doubt if he will be recognized as an authority in the science of modern business.

What do we propose to do? We propose—camping sorrowfully and regretfully upon Democratic ground for the purpose of giving final efficacy to what we do—we propose, by modifying certain provisions of the act of 1894, to put at the disposal of the Treasury annually nearly $40,000,000; and then we propose by an authority of law which ought always to exist in this country to permit the orderly, economical use of the public credit to maintain the reserves of the Treasury and to provide against temporary deficiencies in the revenue. Now, in order to do that, we have to do a thing which we have got quite accustomed to in these later years. Ever since the Democratic party has been in charge of the Government I have been politically embarrassed every now and then by the duty that has been laid upon me of "rising above party." [Laughter.] About once in three months there comes a demand to this House for the Republican party to rise above its principles and its platform and do something to meet the exigencies of the public Treasury.

To-day we come and offer to the uneasy Treasury of the United States an increment of revenue of $40,000,000 annually, and then we propose to clothe the Secretary with discretion to make a legal, salutary use of the national credit to protect the solvency of the Government and to maintain the value and parity of all the outstanding currency of the United States. There can be no permanent disaster in a country like this. As my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has said, a country with assets and integrity is always safe in the business world. There is one thing that we ought all to be agreed upon, whatever else we are divided about, and that is that the Treasury of the United States should no longer be left at the mercy of the organized avarice of the world without money to pay or power to borrow or means for increasing the public revenue; and so, Mr. Speaker, closing this debate, I appeal to the patriotic sentiment that may still be supposed to reside in the Democratic breast to meet the Republican party halfway when we offer upon your own party principles a measure to relieve the embarrassment and distress of the Treasury of the United States. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as but two minutes of the time remain, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the previous question be considered as now made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will put the question.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 228, nays 83, not voting 44; as follows:

Mr. HANLY with Mr. BERRY.

Mr. ODELL with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. ATWOOD with Mr. MEREDITH.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF UTAH TERRITORIAL OFFICES, ETC.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution to transfer certain offices of the United States in the Territory of Utah to the officers of the State of Utah.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States (the Senate concurring), That the governor and secretary of the Territory of Utah be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, upon the issuance of Executive proclamation declaring Utah a State, to deliver to the then governor and secretary of the State of Utah, for the use and benefit of said State, the safes, desks, and all furniture and fixtures of their respective offices, and all property of like character belonging to the United States, under control of the secretary, including that held by the board known as the Utah Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask whether this is the usual form of resolution adopted on the admission of a State, and whether the property designated in the latter part of this resolution is needed by the State. The Commission named, if I remember correctly, was a sort of extraordinary commission.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. The property enumerated in the resolution is needed by the State. This resolution is not in the usual form for the reason that we have had in that Territory an unusual condition. Only in Utah has there existed any such board as that known as the Utah Commission. Its offices now contain all the necessary machinery for the proper conduct of the State government. The enabling act did not make provision for this transfer. My attention was called to the matter this morning by the present Territorial governor, and with the approval of the Treasury Department this resolution has been prepared and introduced.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is this a concurrent resolution?

Mr. CANNON of Utah. It is.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems to me it ought to be a joint resolution. I suggest that it be so modified.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. Then I propose the necessary amendment for that purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I wish to inquire the meaning of the words "like property," embraced in the resolution.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. Those words refer to the fixtures of the offices under the control of the secretary of Utah, who is also the secretary of the board known as the Utah Commission—the election board, in other words, provided by the Edmunds Act of 1882.

In accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I now ask unanimous consent that the form of the resolution be changed, so that it may be a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that change will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. COX. I object.

COINAGE OF SILVER BULLION.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a substitute which I desire to offer to-morrow (if I am permitted to do so by the rule) for the bill which the Ways and Means Committee have reported, authorizing the sale of bonds and the issue of certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. WELLINGTON objected.

TRANSFER OF UTAH TERRITORIAL OFFICES, ETC.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] has withdrawn his objection to the resolution which I desired to have acted on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, as the Chair is informed, withdraws his objection. Is there further objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of this joint resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read, as a part of my remarks on this bill, a substitute which I desire to offer to-morrow for the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report this as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act directing the coinage of the silver bullion held in the Treasury, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to coin as rapidly as possible the silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion, and the issuing of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," into standard silver dollars, which shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued in the purchase of the said bullion.

SEC. 2. That whenever any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall be canceled and destroyed in amounts equal to the coin in the Treasury derived from the coinage herein provided for, and the notes so canceled and destroyed shall be replaced by the standard silver dollars herein directed to be coined.

SEC. 3. That any holder of said standard silver dollars may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates as now authorized by law, and the standard silver dollars used to replace Treasury notes as herein provided for may be held in the Treasury and certificates issued in lieu thereof. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates herein authorized shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand, and said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued.

SEC. 4. That whenever any of the United States notes commonly known as "greenbacks," or any of the notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issuing of Treasury notes, and for other purposes," are presented for redemption, they shall be redeemed in gold or silver coin, as the convenience of the Treasury may require, but in no case shall they be redeemed in gold when the gold in the Treasury above the amount held for the redemption of gold certificates is less than $100,000,000: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to alter or repeal the act of May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes."

SEC. 5. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. If there is no further debate [laughter], the the Chair will put the question. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Utah what has become of the State of Utah—whether the enabling act passed by Congress and signed by the President has been carried into effect by the action of the people of Utah; and where, along the line somewhere, the whole business has been lodged; and whether the law has been executed or violated, so far as he knows, by the Executive of this Government?

Mr. CANNON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, the law, so far as the people of Utah could execute it, has been fully carried out, as has been the fashion in Utah now for some years past with reference to all of the laws of the United States. The bill provided for a constitution to be framed by the people, which was presented in due form to the President of the United States, and we are now awaiting his issuance of a proclamation announcing its adoption. I am informed by officials at the Department that the proclamation has been prepared, and will be issued by the President on the 4th of January next.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment excepting from the operation of this joint resolution such property as shall be required for the use of the United States.

My object is to prevent the turning over of libraries and other valuable personal property, which may be required for the use of the United States Government, to the State.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. If the gentleman from New York will allow an explanation, I think he will withdraw his amendment. There is no such property in the offices to be turned over of the character he has described. The United States courts and the land offices and other offices of that character will continue in the possession of the property they now possess. This resolution refers merely to the Territorial conveniences which would naturally pass to the officers of the State, and would not include libraries or anything of that sort.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. On that statement I withdraw the amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PICKLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURTON of Ohio, until January 2, on account of important business.

To Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ODELL, until Monday, on account of important business.

To Mr. SPENCER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. OTEY, for one week, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. ALLEN, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HARRISON, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MAHANY: A bill (H. R. 2751) to provide for the construction of a bridge or tunnel across Niagara River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CATRON: A bill (H. R. 2765) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

By Mr. LINTON: A bill (H. R. 2766) empowering and directing the Secretary of War to furnish two pieces of condemned cannon to Forest Lawn Cemetery, Saginaw East Side, Mich.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NORTHWAY (by request): A bill (H. R. 2767) for the development and encouragement of silk, flax, and ramie culture and their preparation and manufacture in the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HARMER: A bill (H. R. 2768) to authorize the extension of the Columbia Railway, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MURPHY of Arizona: A bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2770) to provide for an additional justice of the supreme court of Arizona—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MADDOX: A bill (H. R. 2771) to authorize the Attorney-General to bring suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians, the Comanche, Kiowa, Apache, Choctaw, and Chickasaw tribes, to determine and settle the legal or equitable interest of said Indians in certain lands located between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degree of west longitude, in Oklahoma Territory, and located within the territory leased from the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes in the year 1855 and ceded in 1866, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California: A bill (H. R. 2772) to appropriate money for the construction of works to impound mining débris, and thereby to protect the navigable streams of California—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2773) to amend an act entitled "An act to create the California débris commission and regulate hydraulic mining in the State of California," approved March 1, 1893, by amending section 22 thereof—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2774) to provide for ascertaining and determining the character of certain lands in the State of California—to Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 2775) to amend chapter 6 of Title XXXII of the Revised Statutes, relating to mineral lands and mining resources—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 2776) to further increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BRODERICK: A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MEREDITH: A bill (H. R. 2778) to light and improve public thoroughfare between the northwest section of the city of Washington and the Zoological, the Rock Creek, and Soldiers' Home parks—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. COBB of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 2779) authorizing Isaac M. Mason and Webster M. Samuel, and their associates, to improve the channel of the Mississippi River between St. Louis, and Cairo, Ill., and between Cairo, Ill., and Vicksburg, Miss., upon certain conditions and for certain considerations to be paid by the United States, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. HULL (by request): A bill (H. R. 2780) extending the benefits of the act of June 27, 1890, to certain persons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLUE: A bill (H. R. 2781) providing for the return to the War Department of obsolete or unserviceable arms or military supplies by any State or Territory or the District of Columbia and the crediting of the respective States, Territories, or District therefor—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PICKLER: A bill (H. R. 2782) to codify and arrange the laws relating to pensions—to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 27, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate authorizing the Public Printer to employ such clerical aid as may be necessary for copying the messages of the Presidents from the Journals of the Senate and the House of Representatives and the Executive Journals.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2720) to make Palm Beach, Fla., a subport of entry and delivery; and

A bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and provide against a deficiency.

IMPROVEMENT OF CLEAR WATER RIVER, IDAHO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant, calling for information in his possession relative to the improvement of the Clear Water River, Idaho, begun under the project submitted by Maj. J. M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, in 1878, a report of W. P. Craighill, Chief of Engineers, dated December 19, 1895, together with a report from Capt. W. L. Fisk, Corps of Engineers, dated December 10, 1895; which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REBUILDING OF THE SHIP CONSTITUTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, transmitting estimates of the cost of thoroughly rebuilding the old ship Constitution, now stationed at Portsmouth, N. H.; which, with the accompanying estimates, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 20th instant, a statement respecting an agreement of common carriers of interstate traffic between the Western States and the Atlantic Seaboard to form a joint traffic association; which, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2720) to make Palm Beach, Fla., a subport of entry and delivery was read twice by its title.

Mr. CALL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I ask that committee to report it immediately, as it is a matter of very great urgency.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase the revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the New York Produce Exchange, praying for the enactment of legislation in accordance with the recommendation contained in the recent message of the President, to relieve the present financial condition of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation, without regard to party bias, relieving the present financial condition of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of John B. Moulton, late private Company K, Twenty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, praying that certain relief be granted him for services rendered during the late war; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I present resolutions adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to the claims of Massachusetts against the United States for the removal of wrecks in tide water. I ask that the resolutions be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

[Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In the year 1895.]

Resolutions relative to Massachusetts' claims against the United States for the removal of wrecks in tide waters.

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, request the members of Congress from this Commonwealth to use their best efforts to procure from the General Government an appropriation to reimburse the Commonwealth for removing wrecks from navigable channels in tide waters in cases where the necessary delay on the part of the United States authorities incident to fulfilling the requirements of the acts of Congress in such case made and provided have made it necessary for the Commonwealth to act in order to avoid the impairment of freedom of navigation for an unnecessary length of time, and also to amend existing acts of Congress, to the end that the United States authorities may be able to remove wrecks in navigable channels of tide waters forthwith upon their discovery.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the secretary of the Commonwealth to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

In house of representatives, adopted March 21, 1895.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 26, 1895.
A true copy. Attest:

WM. M. OLIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOAR. I present another resolution of the legislature of Massachusetts which was passed just about the close of the last Congress. It relates to a matter which was acted upon by Congress—the lottery matter. I suggest that the resolution be printed in the RECORD instead of being read at the desk, and that it lie on the table.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Commonwealth of Massachusetts. In the year 1895.]

Resolutions relative to national legislation for the suppression of the lottery traffic.

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in general court assembled, respectfully urge upon Congress the enactment of legislation which will prevent, so far as possible, the introduction of lottery matter into the United States from foreign countries and its transportation from one State to another.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, properly attested, be transmitted by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and also to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In senate, adopted March 1, 1895.
In house of representatives, adopted, in concurrence, March 6, 1895.
A true copy. Attest:

WM. M. OLIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Congregation, of Newburg, N. Y.; a petition of Rev. A. P. Van Gieson, D. D., Hon. Charles N. Arnold, mayor, and sundry other citizens of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; a petition of the Reformed Church of Jersey City, N. J., and a petition of sundry citizens of Haverhill, Mass., praying that the President make known to the Government of Turkey the strong feeling of regret with which the people of the United States have heard of the injuries inflicted upon Christians in Turkey, and approving the steps already taken by the United States for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens in Turkey; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing full and active protection to the woolgrowers of the United States, and duties compensatory on the manufactures of wool upon the lines and principles of Schedule K of the act of 1890; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a series of resolutions adopted by the Farmers' National Congress of the United States, composed of delegates appointed by the governors of the various States, in annual session at Atlanta, Ga., held October 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, and 16, 1895, 36 States being represented by 328 delegates. The resolutions relate to the protection of agricultural products, the free coinage of gold and silver, the restoration and rehabilitation of the merchant marine, the construction of a continuous deep waterway from Lake Erie or Ontario to the deep waters of the Hudson at Albany, the improvement of the navigation of the ports on the Atlantic, etc. The officer of the congress in sending me these resolutions asked me to request the Senate to print the memorial as a public document, and I hope that it may be so ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the memorial will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Illinois State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting option dealing in grain; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Illinois State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the free mail delivery to the rural districts; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Illinois State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, remonstrating against the issuance of interest-bearing bonds and the retirement of greenbacks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Illinois State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the abolishment of the veto power and the submission of acts of Congress to the people through the initiative referendum; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Illinois State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the enactment of legislation equalizing and reducing freight and passenger rates on all interstate railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Haverhill, in the State of Massachusetts, approving the recent action of the United States in demanding of Turkey protection to the life and interests of American residents in that Empire; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the New England Furniture Exchange, of Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BACON. I present a petition of the Savannah Board of Trade, calling the attention of Congress to the necessity of increased defenses for the harbor of Savannah and other seacoast cities, and praying for the enactment into law of the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] providing for the improvement of seacoast defenses. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY presented resolutions of citizens of Plain Grove, Pa., favoring the intervention of this country to suppress outrages upon Christians in Turkey; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of Hon. Charles A. Russell and 24 other citizens of Killingly; the petition of Ebenezer J. Hill and 20 other citizens of Norwalk; the petition of R. W. H. Jarvis and 61 other citizens of Hartford, and the petition of Hon. Arthur D. Osborne and 20 other citizens of New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the purchase by the Government of certain lots adjoining old Fort Griswold, in the town of Groton, Conn.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT. On Tuesday I introduced a bill (S. 1166) for the relief of Dorence Atwater, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I now present a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Connecticut in reference to the matter. As a similar resolution has already been presented by my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY], I do not ask to have it read or that it appear in the RECORD, but let it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, in connection with the bill which I introduced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred as indicated.

MR. FIELDS'S PAPER ON FINANCES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a communication from a worthy gentleman, Mr. John T. Fields, of St. Louis, Mo., giving a financial plan and a few lines in explanation of it. It is short, and I move that it be printed as a miscellaneous document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 894) granting a pension to Nancy G. Allabach, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ACCEPTANCE OF RAM KATAHDIN.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. R. 32) authorizing and directing the acceptance of the ram Katahdin, thereby making the vessel part of the United States Navy. I ask that the joint resolution may be considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator, before he objects, listen to the reason for the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will withhold my objection to hear the reason stated.

Mr. HALE. This measure is recommended by the Navy Department for the reason that technically the Department could not accept the ram, which had not made the speed required in the contract. But all the reports from every board of examination, from naval officers, and from the Secretary declare how complete a ship it is. The Secretary recommends acceptance, taking the ground that the technical right to accept does not exist in the Department, but that it exists in Congress. I have the Secretary's letter here.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the Senator from South Dakota objects I hope he will hear the Secretary's letter.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Secretary to read that part of the letter which recommends acceptance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., December 23, 1895.

* * * In answer to your request "for information as to the grounds which prevented the acceptance of the ram by the Department and a statement of the facts as to the manner of construction, and whether the ram does not furnish to all intents and purposes a substantial compliance with the contract, and whether in your (my) judgment it is not desirable that the ram be accepted and put upon the list of commissioned vessels of the United States Navy," I have to state as follows:

The ship is well built and has been completed in accordance with the contract save in a few minor particulars, and is a desirable vessel for the Navy, being designed for harbor defense. The construction of the Katahdin was authorized as an experiment, and inasmuch as the proper method of applying the principles of naval architecture to a vessel of her type had never been demonstrated, the results that would be obtained were by no means ascertainable, and it was, therefore, largely conjectural as to what performance she would be capable of. The Bath Iron Works accepted the contract for this vessel upon faith in the Department's designs of hull and machinery; they complied with the letter of the contract and endeavored in good faith to carry out the desires of the Department in regard to particulars that had not been fully prescribed. They performed their part of the undertaking in the most satisfactory manner and did everything that it was possible to do to make the vessel fulfill the purposes of Congress in authorizing her construction and prove successful and efficient. Their success is evidenced by the fact that the power which the engines were designed to develop was exceeded, but it seems that the good workmanship applied on the hull could not offset the resistance to be met with on account of the peculiar lines of this type of vessel, and her failure to develop the required speed can in no wise be attributed to fault on the part of the contractors. Owing to the way the ram behaved on the trial when her engines were exerting their full power, the Department is of opinion that it would probably be impossible to make a ship of this kind run at 17 knots an hour with engines of any horsepower that could be put into her.

The vessel was sent to the navy-yard, New York, to remain there at the risk and expense of the contractors until the question as to her acceptance should be decided, and she is still at that yard.

The Department recommends that it be given authority to accept the vessel under the contract for her construction, the contractors to make good all uncompleted work necessary to put the vessel in the condition required by the contract. * * *

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
United States Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know whether the contract provided for an additional bonus in case of greater speed than that required by the contract?

Mr. HALE. The contract is the only ironclad contract that was ever made, calling for a specific speed, with no provision for a right to accept it if less than that were attained. The Secretary had no right to give premiums. The truth is that the contract ought not to have been made in that way. It ought not to have been ironclad, but when the contractor made it he was at the mercy of the Department. He built entirely on the plans of the Department; and as is shown, and as the Secretary shows, it was probably a literal impossibility to get that amount of speed out of that kind of a ship as designed by the Navy.

So strong is the case that it went both to the Secretary and to the President and they both recommend, in effect, that Congress authorize the Department to accept this ship. They have no authority now to accept it. I may say to the Senator that I do not think a stronger case can be made than this. I can not imagine a stronger case. I thought that perhaps the Department would have the authority to accept the ram by the act of the Secretary or of the President, but I recognize the force of their reasoning that technically they have not that power, and that it could only be given by Congress.

The contractor has gone on, I will say, and has spent $40,000 or $50.000 in trials additionally, and he loses that, anyway.

I should be very glad if the joint resolution could be passed before the first of the year.

Mr. FRYE. It only lacked half a knot, did it not?

Mr. HALE. Oh, a fraction of a knot.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think it is an exceedingly bad precedent when we pay great commissions to secure greater speed and then accept a vessel that falls below the required speed without any reason whatever. Further than that, a vessel that will not make the required speed under a test of speed will fall several knots behind the speed required in actual service, because in these tests they secure the most skillful and able firemen they can obtain, sometimes sending a great distance for them; they select every pound of coal by hand, and then they put the vessel to the highest possible strain. So if this vessel is required to make 17 knots and falls short one-half a knot, it can be expected to make from 13 to 14 knots in actual service.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator right here that the officer who is to take command of the ram has been examined by the committee, or members of it, and he states, what will be apparent to the Senator when I state it, that the 17-knot speed was not by any means required. In ramming a vessel of a hostile fleet, as Captain Leary says, he would never require more than a speed of 12 knots, which is 4 knots less than this ship can make. The Merrimac, which committed such devastation in 1861, never got up to a speed of 10 knots. The impact, the blow, is more destructive; and Captain Leary says he should never put the ship to the speed even of 16 knots when she strikes the blow.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine one question, if he will allow me. Suppose there were not any contract and this vessel were offered to the United States at the price, would it not be a good bargain to buy it?

Mr. HALE. So the Secretary says, and so the President says. Let me say further to the Senator from South Dakota—I see the point about premiums—there is not a provision for premiums in the late bills, and in no future bill will there be any such provision. I should be very glad if the Senator could let this measure go through, because it is important that it should be passed before the 1st of January.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Inasmuch as there are peculiar conditions surrounding this matter, and inasmuch as the responsibility is upon the Secretary of the Navy, who recommends that the vessel be received, I will withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. There is objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska objects.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if there is to be any reduction in consequence of the failure of this vessel to reach the required speed?

Mr. HALE. No; the Department, in consideration of the reason as given by the Secretary that the ram has been built under their design and under their plans and is in every respect a better ship than was agreed to be furnished and furnishes a larger horsepower, does not claim any deduction. The contractor has already suffered a penalty of near $40,000 in the trials, which were at his expense.

Mr. ALLEN. What was the contract price?

Mr. HALE. About $1,000,000.

Mr. ALLEN. How far does this vessel fall short of reaching the required speed?

Mr. HALE. Only a fraction of a knot.

Mr. ALLEN. That is under a test something like the Senator from South Dakota has indicated?

Mr. HALE. It is the test that is applied to all of continuous speed.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine (who is entirely familiar with these matters, and I myself am not) whether this vessel in actual service can make anything like the time that it would make on one of the exhibitions or tests?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I have no doubt that in any emergency she can make the 16 and odd knots, but I have just stated—the Senator perhaps was not listening—that the officer who is to take charge of her says that in actual use as a harbor defender he would never need 17 knots. The ram is not to pursue and overtake, but is to meet and oppose and strike, and 14 or 15 knots are just as good as 16 or 17 knots.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the Senator believe that 17 knots would be better?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not; not for ramming.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, if the vessel had a capacity of 17 knots and then used such speed as might be necessary?

Mr. HALE. If I were framing a contract for another ram I should not ask for over 14 or 15 knots.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the bill ought to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not press his objection.

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: If the Chair will lay the joint resolution again before the Senate, the Senator from Nebraska will not, I think, object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. What is it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the joint resolution which was reported by the Senator from Maine. The title will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 32) authorizing and directing the acceptance of the ram Katahdin, thereby making said ram a part of the United States Navy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in line 4, after the word "make," to strike out "her" and insert "said vessel;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to accept the ram Katahdin, and to make said vessel a part of the United States Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I understand it to be true that the coast defense vessels do not require the speed of either the cruisers or the battle ships in order to be efficient for the principal object of their construction, which is to assist in the defense of our harbors. For example, I have learned from experts of the Navy Department that it is not specially important that the speed of such vessels as the Monterey should be 16 knots per hour for the purpose of harbor defense. While I have no objection to this rate of speed or even greater speed if it can be obtained in this class of vessels, consistently with other essential qualities, yet I do not regard this rate of speed as being essential. Hence, if there be proven only a slight falling off from the speed required in the specifications for the Katahdin, I am willing to have the full purchase price paid for her if she is right in all other respects for the purpose for which she is built. Accordingly, as at present informed, I favor the passage of the joint resolution of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to make a suggestion just there. It is very convenient for such a vessel to have a speed of 16 or 17 knots an hour, and I had rather say instead of that it is not desirable to have such a speed, that it is not absolutely indispensable. In case of a vessel having to cross a harbor to meet an enemy, a speed of 15 or 16 or 17 knots may be very convenient sometimes. As to the effect of a moving mass of iron weighing a thousand tons, there can be no doubt that at a speed of 5 miles an hour it would enter the side of any ship in the world.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PALM BEACH (FLA.) PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2720) to make Palm Beach, Fla., a subport of entry and delivery, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of that bill. I will state that there has been established at the terminus of the railroad a line of steamers to the Bahamas, commencing on the 17th of the month. It is a long way to any port of entry; there will be considerable inconvenience and a very great delay unless some special legislation is had creating a subport for the entry and discharge of vessels at that place.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 1180) to pay the heirs of the late John Roach, deceased, $48,858.03, for labor and material furnished for the gunboat Dolphin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1181) to pay the heirs of the late John Roach, deceased, $330,151.42 for labor and material, dockage and detention, and occupation of yards and shops for the gunboats Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1182) granting a pension to Mary E. Tyson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1183) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1184) for the relief of telegraph operators who served during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1185) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1186) granting a pension to Mrs. Rebecca S. Holman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 1187) to provide for the reorganization of the consular and diplomatic service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 1188) to provide for the erection of a monument to Gen. Nathanael Greene on the battlefield of Guilford Court-House; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1189) granting a pension to Eliza Sandford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1190) for the relief of Lizzie M. Sibley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1191) granting a pension to Francis Sherman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1192) granting a pension to Daniel Cooledge Fletcher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1193) granting a pension to William Bradshaw; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to Ezra J. Riggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1195) granting a pension to Sarah M. Bennett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 1196) to authorize Charles E. Fenner, executor of George E. Payne, deceased, to prosecute his claim before the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1197) for the relief of Marcellin Gillis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 1198) to provide for the restatement, readjustment, settlement, and payment of dues to army officers in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1199) to place Francis A. Field, late captain, Eleventh United States Infantry, on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1200) for an additional circuit judge in the sixth judicial circuit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 1201) for the relief of Joseph Reise, alias Julius Rosier, late of Company D, Second Regiment New Jersey Infantry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1202) to establish a University of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee to Establish the University of the United States.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1204) for the relief of John C. Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1205) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1206) granting a pension to John L. Kirk; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PASCO introduced a bill (S. 1207) to provide for the complete execution of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1208) for the relief of Riley Moutrey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1209) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1210) to pay just compensation to William Wheeler Hubbell for his invention of high-power steel guns and improvements in other guns made and adopted by the United States for its military service and Navy at the present time; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1211) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for the purchase of a lot of land opposite to the Gosport Navy-Yard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1212) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims and for the relief of Samuel Fitzhugh, administrator of Henry Fitzhugh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1213) to provide for the erection of a post-office building at Fortress Monroe, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 1214) to appropriate funds for investigations and tests of American timber; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 1215) granting a pension to Ellen Kingsley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1216) for the relief of John W. Lewis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 1217) for the relief of the legal representatives of P. M. Craigmiles, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to introduce a bill to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeal, and for other purposes, and a bill in relation to suits against railroad corporations in Federal courts.

I wish to say that the bills were prepared at the Department of Justice, in accordance with the recommendations of the Attorney-General's report. They have my approbation, except that they may require some slight amendment. I ask that they be twice read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bills which he is about to introduce were sent to me in his absence, and I introduced them and had them referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I was not aware of that. I withdraw the bills.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced a bill (S. 1218) to facilitate the collecting of revenue, to provide for the construction and equipment of sampling works for the sampling and assaying of imported silver ores and other ores containing lead, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEFFER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1219) to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg in the service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 33) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to coin as rapidly as possible the silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 35) to amend the Constitution of the United States relating to direct taxes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO REVENUE BILL.

Mr. BURROWS. I introduce a bill, and if I may be indulged a word in explanation it will avoid the necessity of reading the bill in extenso.

By the tariff act of 1893 a large number of articles were placed on the free list hitherto dutiable. By the measure which has just passed the House of Representatives the rate of taxation on the dutiable list as it now exists has been increased, but the articles made free by the Wilson Act, with the exception of wool and lumber, remain on the free list. The bill I propose is to restore to the dutiable list the articles taxable under the law of 1890, imposing upon them a rate of duty in harmony with the bill just passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that this body has no right to originate a bill imposing duties on imported goods or in any measure a revenue bill. Therefore the bill should be offered in the nature of an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. BURROWS. I intended to offer the bill that it might be referred to the Committee on Finance and considered by that committee, with the hope that it would be ingrafted as an amendment on the revenue bill. Of course I was aware of the fact that revenue measures can not originate in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is contrary to the Constitution for the Senate to attempt such legislation, except in the way of an amendment to the House bill. I think it had better be introduced as an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. I will offer it as an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. QUAY. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and provide against a deficiency. The amendment proposes to increase the duty upon imported leaf tobacco to the rate provided for by the McKinley Act. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill (S. 895) for the relief of Christopher Ellis was erroneously referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PASCO, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of A. J. Tinsley, of Florida, now in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

SALE OF BONDS.

Mr. HILL. I introduce a joint resolution, which I desire to have read in full, after which, with the consent of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks upon it.

The joint resolution (S. R. 34) to extend the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the sale of bonds under existing laws was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That any bonds hereafter issued under the laws now in force may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made payable in United States gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness or in standard silver dollars, at the option of the holders of such bonds, but no bond containing such option shall bear a rate of interest exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire at this time to explain the purpose and effect of this joint resolution.

Under our existing financial system, for which candor compels me to say both of the principal political parties of the country are largely responsible, there are outstanding to-day about $346,000,000 of legal-tender United States notes, which this Government is considered obliged to redeem in gold whenever presented for redemption, and when redeemed these notes—which are demand debts of the Government—can not be retired or canceled, but must be reissued and paid out. As a redemption fund for this purpose the Government is obliged to maintain a "gold reserve," so called, of $100,000,000. That fund to-day is only about $68,000,000, and is rapidly disappearing by reason of the large amount of greenbacks being daily presented for redemption. In a few days this fund is likely to be less than $50,000,000. The honor and credit of the Government require that this fund shall be restored to the full sum of $100,000,000.

How is the Government with reasonable dispatch to procure this necessary gold? Every avenue of securing it is blocked, except the one method of borrowing it. The revenues of the Government are not paid in gold, and while the Government itself must pay in gold, it can not compel, under existing laws, its revenues to be paid in that coin, and it has, therefore, but one practical recourse left, and that is to borrow the gold upon the best terms possible.

It can not refuse to redeem the greenbacks whenever presented. It can not regulate their presentment. The law requires it to pay, redeem, and then reissue them. Any other course is repudiation; anything less is national dishonor.

The question which now confronts us—the practical question, the condition, not the theory—is, in what manner shall the gold revenue fund be restored?

Its prompt restoration is the duty of the hour. It can not safely be postponed. It is the duty of the coming week, not of two weeks hence.

As gold must be borrowed, and borrowed at once, it follows that the Government should be permitted to make the best terms possible for the people. If it was unhampered and unrestricted—if it could negotiate and borrow the same as an individual—the task would be materially lessened, but it is restricted by laws passed years ago which it must observe and respect. The law which especially controls and regulates the method of borrowing gold to supply the gold reserve is the resumption act of 1875. That statute, taken in connection with the act of July 14, 1870, regulates and prescribes what bonds may be issued for such purpose. I know that it has been claimed that this statute furnishes no authority for present redemption, but that contention does not seem to be very seriously insisted upon. The power is alleged to exist, and has been repeatedly exercised. No court has decided against its existence nor is likely to. The Secretary of the Treasury will continue to exercise the power and may safely do so. It is the only feasible method left by which to protect the credit of the Treasury.

That statute (taken in connection with the law of 1870) authorizes the issue of coin bonds as follows: Ten-year bonds, interest payable semiannually at 5 per cent; fifteen-year bonds, at 4½ per cent; thirty-year bonds, at 4 per cent.

There is no authority to issue any other kind or form of bonds for redemption purposes. No less rate of interest can be secured upon the face of the bonds. A less rate must be secured by the exaction of premiums or not at all. There is no authority to issue gold bonds, even though a less rate of interest might be secured thereby. The provisions of this statute hamper, restrict, and embarrass the Government, so far as the securing of favorable terms is concerned. Unless this statute should be modified, whatever bonds are now to be issued must be issued thereunder. There is no other alternative. While the existence of this old statute is the sole reliance and protection of the Government at this time, my criticism of it is that its provisions are not sufficiently elastic—not broad or liberal enough—to fully and adequately meet the present emergency. More discretion should be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. He should be permitted to issue gold or silver bonds as may be deemed most expedient. The rates of interest should be reduced. The conditions which existed in 1870 and 1875 do not now exist and are inapplicable to the present situation.

The joint resolution which I have introduced simply enlarges the discretion vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, enabling him to issue bonds payable either in gold or silver at the option of the holders, but reducing the rate of interest to be exacted on any bonds which may be issued containing such option. I can see no objection to this modification. I do not know whether this change would be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury or not, and it is somewhat immaterial to me. I do not see how he could well oppose it. He may desire other modifications, more sweeping and radical; he undoubtedly desires legislation in accordance with the full recommendations of his annual report—many of which I fully concur in, and with others of which I do not entirely agree. But be that as it may, it is unpracticable to enact such legislation to meet the crisis which now especially confronts us, and which must be speedily met.

Let us be practical. Unless this old statute shall be changed unquestionably bonds must be issued thereunder within the next ten days.

It matters not that as a general principle we may be opposed to the further issuing of Government bonds and to the further increase of the national debt. The power exists to issue them—it is the only authority now provided by which to sustain the national credit; and they will inevitably be issued, whether we approve or not—issued at a high and unnecessary rate of interest. Why should we refuse to simply change the rate of interest and to enlarge the discretion of the Secretary so as to enable him to make the best bargain possible for the Government? Will we refuse to amend a statute so as to render it more acceptable and less burdensome simply because we may not like the original statute, or do not approve other provisions of the statute as amended?

An opportunity is here presented to us to save the people millions of dollars in the shape of interest, and why should we not avail ourselves of it?

If those who have money to loan are willing to charge us a lesser rate of interest if the bonds to be issued are made payable in gold, it is difficult to see what reasonable objection can be urged to making them so payable at the option of the holders.

Everybody believes that we should always pay our bonds in the best money in use—always pay them in gold if any difference exists in the real value of gold and silver, and if that be the case why not declare our purpose on the face of the bonds—our purpose to permit the holders to have either currency they desire. If that option shall enable us to negotiate our bonds at a less rate of interest, why not avail ourselves of it?

It is a business proposition which is presented to us. It does not involve, neither does it antagonize, any question relating to the free coinage of silver. That question is wholly foreign to the proposition submitted. There are three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks afloat, which are being constantly presented to the Government for payment, for redemption, and the gold must be forthcoming, or else repudiation ensues; there is no adequate time to retire these greenbacks, because the question of redemption is actually upon us; bonds must be issued under this old statute, and the only question involved is whether we shall by our inaction, by our refusal—by our obstinate refusal, I might say—to modify its provisions so as to permit greater discretion to be exercised and so as to permit the bonds to draw a less rate of interest, compel the Government to pay an enormous unnecessary sum of money for interest. Is not such refusal virtually a wicked waste of the people's money, a virtual squandering of public funds, for which we will surely be held responsible?

Have Senators reflected upon what amount of money we have now an opportunity to save? The change proposed will save the people on an issue of fifty millions of bonds at least 1 per cent interest, which on thirty-year bonds will amount to $15,000,000. If the bonds issued shall be one hundred millions, the interest saved will be double that sum. This estimate assumes that coin bonds can not in the present emergency be floated for less than 4 per cent. I hope they can. There are many who seriously doubt whether they can be floated for less than 5 per cent; and if so, the loss to the people will be 2 per cent annually, amounting in the aggregate to $30,000,000.

Besides, if no legislative relief shall be agreed upon between the two Houses, or between the two Houses and the President, as to the permanent disposition of the greenback currency or the maintenance of the gold reserve, then numerous future issues of bonds must occur and similar losses must continue, ad infinitum, so long as the Government under existing laws is compelled to maintain at par with gold a credit paper currency and required to be constantly able to redeem it.

The question is often asked, why does not the Government issue a "popular loan," so called, to replenish the gold reserve? And it is intimated that such a loan would naturally draw from its hiding places vast quantities of gold now hoarded by the people and prevent the necessity for seeking gold abroad. The answer is plain; the very statute which I am criticising and am virtually proposing to amend practically makes such a loan very difficult. The high rate of interest which the present statute compels the bonds issued thereunder to draw upon their face, and which is higher than the Government ought really to pay, practically requires the bonds to be sold at a premium in order to reduce the actual interest to a reasonable market rate, and the exaction of such premium prevents a popular disposition of bonds. Premiums are liable to fluctuate in the market, and the average man wants to know exactly what he is purchasing and what he is likely to receive when he sells. He does not want the real value of his bonds to be determined by an uncertain premium which he may or may not thereafter realize. He prefers to purchase bonds at their face value, with the true rate of interest which he is certain to realize correctly specified thereon, rendering the whole transaction one of easy calculation.

The amendment here proposed would make a popular loan feasible. If investors loan gold to the Government they wish to be sure that gold will be repaid. They prefer to retain the option themselves—to retain the privilege of determining for themselves—whether they will accept gold or silver, and in consideration of that option are naturally willing to accept a lower rate of interest.

What business man desiring a loan of money, and intending to repay it in gold or its full equivalent, will hesitate to agree in the contract itself to pay in gold if the lender so desires, if the borrower can thereby secure a material reduction in the rate of interest?

Why should any prejudice against gold, if any such exists, be permitted to interfere in such a transaction? Why should any general theory about money—any question about independent or international free coinage—be allowed to prevent the consummation of a favorable bargain for the Government and the people?

No free-silver man—no honest and intelligent free-silver man—desires this Government to pay its obligations in silver or to compel its creditors to accept silver, if any difference in market value should exist between the two metals at the time of such payment. As has been repeatedly said by the ablest of silver advocates on this floor, we desire and intend to pay in the best money in use. If that be so, then why not virtually so declare by permitting the holder of our bonds hereafter issued to retain the option as to the kind of money they will accept? If gold and silver shall be kept at a parity, as we all hope and expect will be the case, holders of bonds will not care in which coin they shall be paid; and as we are pledged to maintain that parity and expect to be able to accomplish the task, it becomes really immaterial to us in what coin our bonds shall be made payable in—it becomes a question of no practical importance—except so far as it affects the rate of interest we are forced to pay and the ease with which they can be negotiated. If we can save to the people millions of dollars, what terrible objection can there be to yielding to the caprices, the prejudices—if you so please to term them—the timidity, and lack of confidence which prevail among those from whom we must borrow, and specify in the bonds themselves exactly what coin they are to be paid in, or, what is better still, confer an option on the holder, as suggested in my joint resolution.

Why stand contending about conflicting theories when borrower and lender all mean substantially the same thing and desire the same result, but differ simply as to the precise form of expression—differ as to which party, the borrower or the lender, shall have the option as to the kind of money the bonds shall be payable in, when the Government expects to pay in the best money in use (if any difference in value exists) and can save millions by simply saying so?

Individually, as a mere matter of personal choice, I should prefer our bonds to be payable "in coin," but I do not regard the question as a very important one—certainly not a vital one. I have no gold to lend to the Government, and I presume none of us here has, and hence we do not share in the timidity which affects lenders, especially lenders in other countries. We have greater confidence in the stability, the integrity, and the capacity of our Government than they naturally have, and hence we would not insist, as a condition of a low rate of interest, upon guaranties as to which kind of coin the payments are eventually to be made in. But as the Government must have gold, and as it is preferable for divers reasons to draw it from other countries if possible, we can not expect foreigners to share our confidence, and hence they desire an explicit understanding; and they preferring bonds to be payable in gold I can see no insuperable objection to gratifying them, so long as nobody is harmed and no real principle is jeopardized.

The fact should not be overlooked that the bonds to be issued are not revenue bonds. They are not desired to supply a deficiency in revenues, but are issued for the sole and specific purpose of supplying gold for a gold reserve which we are bound in honor to maintain. Revenue bonds, if any such are necessary to be authorized to be issued, a fact most strenuously denied, however, can still be made payable in coin; but bonds to realize gold to supply a diminishing gold reserve can with propriety be made payable expressly in gold, or contain an option permitting the holders to insist upon that coin if they prefer it.

The difficulties which confront the Treasury and are now embarrassing it do not arise on account of any deficiency in revenues. Those difficulties would still exist even if the present revenues were ample to meet all the expenses of the Government. The Treasury to-day has a cash surplus on hand, over and above the remaining gold reserve, of $100,000,000.

One of the difficulties is that our revenues are not payable in gold, and were they ever so ample they would not supply the gold for the gold reserve. The Government under our financial system must pay out gold—not for the ordinary expenses of Government, it is true, but for the redemption of the greenbacks whenever and as fast and as often as they are presented, and it can only secure that gold in one practical way, to wit, by borrowing it. If the Government did not absolutely require gold, it would easily be obtainable, and would ordinarily be exchangeable for other money. But financiers know the exact situation, and know that the Government, in order to maintain its credit, must redeem these greenbacks in gold, and hence they take advantage of the situation and will not exchange their gold for greenbacks or silver, but, upon the other hand, insist upon requiring gold for greenbacks. This difficulty can not be obviated so long as greenbacks are permitted to be circulated and are bound to be redeemed on presentation, in fact, so long as the Government, under existing laws, is bound to maintain and preserve on a parity with gold a credit paper currency.

New tariff laws will not cure the difficulty, increased greenback and silver revenues will not relieve the embarrassment to any perceptible or material extent; new gold loans will alleviate present conditions, but not permanently. A lasting cure can only be effected by the retirement and cancellation of the entire greenback currency, and the Government thereby relieved from the great burden of supplying a paper credit currency always to be kept at a par with and redeemable in gold.

The able arguments upon this point presented by the President in his annual message and by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report leave nothing to be added. In my humble opinion their contention has not been answered and can not be successfully answered. They have clearly demonstrated that it is our vicious financial system—the evil of our enormous paper circulation, which is a constant drain upon the gold of our Treasury—that has produced the present crisis, and not merely because our annual revenues do not quite equal our annual expenditures. Their facts, their figures, and their illustrations seem conclusive of the question.

The distrust of investors, especially foreign investors, is not of the ability of the Government to increase its revenues by increased taxation, which it can do at any time, if deemed desirable or really necessary—that is a matter of a few millions, comparatively, because they know as well as we know that a surplus is easily obtainable, a surplus, however, of silver and paper currency—but the distrust arises as to whether the Government is able or desirous of maintaining its five hundred millions of paper currency and its more than four hundred millions of silver currency on a parity with the standard money of the world, and hence our paper greenback currency is constantly being presented for redemption, and lenders insist upon gold bonds, and if they accept merely coin bonds they demand a much larger rate of interest.

These are the plain facts. We may say that they ought not to exist, but still they do exist. We may say that investors ought to have more confidence in our financial ability and honesty, but they must be permitted to be the judges of that, and not we ourselves. We must accept the situation as we find it, and deal with it accordingly.

As a measure of permanent relief it is reasonably clear that all the United States notes and Treasury notes should be redeemed and then canceled.

Let me anticipate some of the arguments against this proposition.

It will be said that to accomplish this end there must be an increase of the bonded debt to the extent of the amount of such notes. That is true, because it would not be feasible to raise the necessary money by taxation, at least not immediately. If it can not well be raised by taxation, and as the Government has not sufficient money on hand for that purpose, of course it must be raised by loans.

But it is also true that the bonded debt is necessarily and unavoidably increased under the existing system, and increased without at all diminishing the greenback debt. If no adequate relief is afforded, if no change is made in the present financial system, then it is possible that the bonded debt may be increased to the full amount of our whole greenback currency and yet there will still remain the whole greenback debt. This is so, because under existing laws redemption does not really mean redemption, because it is immediately followed by a reissue of the notes redeemed.

We have already incurred a bonded debt of one hundred and sixty-two millions to redeem outstanding notes to that amount, but not a single note so redeemed has been actually extinguished, but all may be used again for the purpose of creating additional bonded indebtedness.

Why is it not the part of prudence and wisdom to create a bonded debt for the whole amount of these notes and then cancel and extinguish them? That sensible course would stop the creation of any further bonded indebtedness. Otherwise the process of borrowing and bonding must continue—to what extent no one can foretell.

Mr. President, I have not introduced any measure for permanent relief. I have not introduced a measure providing for the retirement of the greenback currency. There is time enough to do that within the next thirty days. The joint resolution which I have introduced is simply presented for the purpose of relieving the present emergency and relieving the exigencies of the Treasury. We can now within the next ten days substantially prevent the issue of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury under the old statute by giving him the discretion permitted under the joint resolution, and thereby reduce the rate of interest to be paid.

I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from New York will allow the joint resolution to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. TELLER. Before the joint resolution is referred I wish to say a few words upon it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Nebraska asks me to allow the joint resolution to lie on the table, and I consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to refer is withdrawn, and the joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the financial question now, but I wish to enter my protest against the assertion that has been made repeatedly through the executive department and now in the Senate of the United States that the Government is bankrupt. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] says we understand now that we can not sell any bonds under the existing law, or words to that effect. I reply that that statement is an error, in my judgment and in the judgment of a great many men who, in my opinion, are better qualified to judge than either the Senator from New York or I. The United States Government can sell at 3 per cent any amount of bonds it chooses to put on the market. It can sell in any market in Europe as many bonds at 3 per cent as the American people are willing it should sell, and a hundred times more. It can sell those bonds at 3 per cent in this country to the extent of $500,000,000, if it wants to do so.

In 1894, a little more than a year ago, the Government of the United States asked for bids for bonds under the existing law. The existing law provides for a 4 per cent bond, but it was thoroughly understood that the Government would not allow a loan to be made that exceeded 3 per cent. Under that proposition only thirteen months ago $178,000,000 of bonds were bid for in this country. It was desired to issue $50,000,000 of bonds, and $178,000,000 of bonds were bid for. The contract was made for $50,000,000 at 2.88 per cent, or a little less than 3 per cent. What has happened in a year which justifies any American Senator in saying that the American credit has been destroyed to the extent that you can not sell a 3 per cent bond in the United States without making it a gold bond? Those were not gold bonds; they were coin bonds which were bid for.

In February last the President of the United States made a contract with a syndicate in New York that will ever stand as a lasting disgrace, either as to the dishonesty or the imbecility of the Administration under which it was made, putting upon the market at $1.0449 $62,000,000 of American bonds, the best bonds in the world and the highest bonds that are sold in any market under the sun. There was a panic in New York the other day and there was a panic in London, and the very best stocks in this country went off from 4 to 10 points. But the American bonds which sold for 104¼ less than a year ago maintained in the face of that panic a quotation of $1.19. Yet the Senator from New York tells us that the American credit is so low that we can not sell a 3 per cent bond at par. I repudiate that statement.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I may or may not reply when the Senator from Colorado is through, but I can not permit that statement to go unchallenged. I have made no such statement as he says I did.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from New York said we can not sell bonds under existing law, as I understood him.

Mr. HILL. That we can not sell bonds under existing law?

Mr. TELLER. That is, we can not find a market for the bonds, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I have not said so.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that the whole address of the Senator from New York was based upon the theory that we have now reached a point where, under existing law, we can not dispose of bonds. If that is not the case, what does the Senator from New York want this relief for?

Mr. HILL. I want this relief for the purpose of having the face of the bonds specify exactly what the interest is; and I said that those who had money to loan, good financiers, doubted the ability of the Government to float a loan at 4 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, that is it! Mr. President, nobody doubts it. We are told—I do not know whether it is true or not, and I do not propose to go into any sensational statements—that there has recently been invited to this city a great banker from the State of New York to consult as to how the Government should get out of the dilemma it is now in. What is the dilemma? What is the trouble now? There is $70,000,000 or thereabouts of gold in the Treasury; there is a surplus of money in the Treasury to pay expenses, and enough to last for a year. What is the emergency presented to the American people that requires the Administration to call here a great banker who was concerned in, I repeat, the former disgraceful operation, financially at least?

We are told by the public press that we are to have another bond issue and that it will not be so favorable this time as before, because the Government of the United States is in greater distress than it was a year ago. Against all this I protest. I protest because I know, and so does everybody else here, that the securities of the United States in every market of the globe are the gilt-edged securities of the world, and to-day bring more than those of almost any other nation. They have never been discredited by any banker nor have they ever been discredited by anybody, save it is by the executive department of the Government under the present Administration and members of the party in sympathy with the Administration, who appear as its champions in the Senate.

I do not intend to discuss the financial question. We shall have plenty of time to do that on the bills that are here and those which it is said are coming here from the other body, but I do want to enter my protest against this degradation of our credit. I repeat that there is not a financier in this country who will not tell you that we can put our bonds upon the market at 3 per cent and sell all we want. Now, because we can do that I do not say it might not be well to amend existing laws, but I say we are not required to amend existing laws because of our inability to get money on our securities.

At the proper time I propose to express my opinion upon all the utterances of the Administration, from the President down to the tidewaiter who now assumes to speak on financial matters. There was a flurry in New York the other day, a bank flurry, brought about, it is said, by the utterances of the President concerning our foreign affairs. Stocks fell, and it was stated that a great quantity of American securities held in Europe were to be returned to this country. The United States assistant treasurer in the city of New York, if the newspapers are correct, announced to the public that in all probability a hundred millions of American securities would be thrown upon our market—a statement well calculated to quiet and maintain the market, was it not?

Every man connected with this Administration, whether it be the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Mint, the assistant treasurer at New York, or a subordinate in office of those officials, has been talking in the newspapers within the last month or two about the lack of American credit. The only way we should know that there is a lack of American credit is through the markets of the world, and the markets do not show that there is any lack of American credit. If any utterances are to come to us or to the public concerning financial affairs, they should come through the Executive and not through the subordinates in any department of the Government.

It is time that the American people resented these repeated attacks upon their credit by the men they have intrusted with power and whom they have put in place to maintain the credit of the Government. If our credit is in danger to-day it is in danger because of the intemperate and uncalled-for utterances of the executive department concerning financial matters. I do not refer to foreign affairs at all. I propose when the time comes to take up the subject and to show that there is not the slightest reason why any man should be afraid of the American credit. I wish to show that, no matter what a man may believe upon financial matters, there is not a man in public life outside of the executive department who has ever suggested that we would not maintain our credit to the highest possible degree. There ought to be no more talk in the country about the lack of our ability to maintain our credit, and it is disgraceful for anybody to suggest that there is not a universal sentiment in this country to maintain the credit of the United States at the highest possible point. The American people intend that it shall be done. They may have their ideas about how it shall be done, but they intend that it shall be done, and any party or any set of men who for a moment advocate anything but the strictest honesty in public affairs in this country will go to the wall, as they ought to do.

I have said this as a protest to what I think is a slander upon the people, a slander upon the Government, and a false statement as to our ability. Who has ever doubted our ability? The richest country in the world, with more untaxed and untouched resources than any five nations on the earth, will maintain its integrity and pay its debt as it has agreed to pay it.

A Democratic President, truckling for Democratic support in the great city of New York, fearful that his utterances on another subject may have brought him into disrepute with the class of men with whom he has always been in accord, will not make the people of the country nor the world believe that we have not both the ability and the inclination to maintain our credit equal to that of any people under the sun.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator from Texas to withdraw the motion.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has asked me to yield to him for a few moments, which I will do, and then I desire to take the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of entering my feeble protest against the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], especially against the conclusions he has reached. We have in this country three forms of paper money issued by the Government. We have practically $346,000,000 of the old legal-tender notes, known to the world as greenbacks; we have about $348,000,000 of certificates issued under the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, and we have $151,000,000 of Treasury notes, issued under what is known as the Sherman Act of July 14, 1890.

The Senator from New York gave utterance to a statement which has been going the rounds for the last three weeks, to the effect that all those notes are redeemable in gold. The President of the United States, in his annual message to us on the convening of the present Congress, stated that the greenback was redeemable in gold. I rise for the purpose of entering my protest against the correctness of the President's statement and the correctness of the statement of the senior Senator from New York. When the greenback was issued, in 1862–63, silver was money of final redemption in this country equally with gold, and those notes were redeemable in coin and are redeemable in coin to-day, and there never has been a minute or an hour or a day when they were redeemable in anything else.

In 1878 Congress passed a law known as the Bland-Allison Act, the third section of which is as follows:

> That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $10 and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and, when so received, may be reissued.

That act provides especially for the redemption of those notes in coin.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. The Senator from Nebraska can just as well address his remarks to the substitute.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas it was the purpose of Congress to keep gold and silver at a parity by investing the Secretary of the Treasury with the discretion of paying the coin obligations of the Government as they mature in either metal: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary, when redeeming Treasury notes, commonly called greenbacks, and when liquidating either the interest or principal of any of the Government's coin obligations, to make such payment in gold coin whenever the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold is less than the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, and to continue to pay in such gold coin until the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be equal to the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver; but when the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold shall be greater than the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver, he shall pay said coin obligations as they mature in silver coin, and continue to pay the same in silver coin until the market value of 412½ grains of standard silver shall be equal to the market value of 25.8 grains of standard gold; and said notes, commonly called greenbacks, when so redeemed, shall be reissued, as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New York says there is no need for revenue, that the bonds to be issued are to enable the Treasury Department to keep up the gold reserve. I have been looking for some law for the gold reserve and have not found it. It seems to be an arbitrary matter. The resolution I have introduced is intended to interpret the law as it stands now and as the people of this country understand it, and it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to obey the law. In the opinion of a large number of the people of this country, if the law had been obeyed in letter and spirit as it was declared by Congress on the 28th of February, 1878, that all our coin obligations should be paid in gold and silver, the emergency message of the President would not have been sent in and there would have been no crisis. The answer I wish to make now to the message and to the resolution of the Senator from New York is to offer this resolution and ask the Senate to pass it, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to obey the law as we now understand it. I wish not only to enter a protest, as the Senator from Colorado says, against the message and the statement that we are bound to pay in gold and that our credit is not good, but I wish to protest against any statement that the coin obligations of the Government must be paid in gold and the Government must borrow gold to do it when we have other resources to pay our debts according to the letter of the law.

Mr. ALLEN. According to the section I have just read, the certificates issued under the act of February 28, 1878, are specifically redeemable in silver coin. The act requires that coin shall be deposited in the Treasury Department for the specific purpose of redeeming the notes issued under it. Any Secretary of the Treasury of the United States who would undertake to redeem those notes in anything but silver coin would violate the statutes and violate his oath of office, and would justly be subject to impeachment.

Now, turn for a moment to the act of July 14, 1890, known as the Sherman Act. The second section, in speaking of notes issued under that act, provides—

That upon demand of the holder of any of the Treasury notes herein provided for the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law.

The old greenback issued during the days of the war, the notes or certificates issued under the Bland-Allison Act of 1878, and the notes issued under the Sherman Act of 1890 are the only forms of paper money this Government has or has ever had since the days of the war. When the President of the United States said in his annual message to us that any of those notes were redeemable in gold he falsified the history of this country. I am not prepared to say that the President of the United States knew that the statement was false at the time it was made. The Senator from New York suggests to me that I had better "go the whole hog," as he calls it. I do not want to impugn the motives of the President of the United States. I want to believe that he is the President of the entire United States and not of Lombard and Wall streets alone. But I say when the President of the United States said that the greenbacks were redeemable in gold he gave utterance to that which all history proves to be false. They were specifically redeemable in coin, and gold and silver were coined upon terms of equality at that time and for several years afterwards.

When the Senator from New York says these different forms of money are redeemable in gold, that statement is not true except as to the notes issued under the act of 1890. The old greenback was redeemable in either metal or in both. The certificates issued under the Bland-Allison Act were specifically redeemable in silver and in nothing else; and according to the terms of the Sherman Act of 1890 it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the notes issued under that act in gold or silver coin at his discretion. Those were the fatal words entering into that act, investing in the Secretary of the Treasury discretion in reference to the redemption of these notes.

The Senator from New York would change the whole law of legal tender. The very element of the law of legal tender is a power or right on the part of the debtor to choose the money in which he shall pay. It has been so throughout the entire history of the common law. There is not a State in the Union where the law is to the contrary to-day. Yet the Senator from New York, by this resolution, would change that common-law rule and invest in the holder of the bonds of the United States the right to demand a specific kind of money.

Mr. President, if there be needed any proof of the money power that controls the affairs of this Government, we have but to turn back to the scenes transpiring in London and New York a few days ago. When the President of the United States sought to redeem his lost fortunes in the estimation of the people by the issuance of his Venezuelan message and precipitated a panic in London, immediately there was a threat of sending back our securities here; and $375,000,000 were lost in the city of New York in one day, according to the report in the New York World of recent date.

Is it not a burning shame that a great nation of 70,000,000 people, of continental magnitude, of exhaustless resources, should have its financial fortunes held in the grasp of a few foreigners? We profess to be American when we come to the Monroe doctrine. When our Republican friends come to the policy of protection they say we must be protected against Great Britain and other foreign countries by a protective tariff; and yet we voluntarily permit the British Empire to dictate to us our financial policy.

Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury had followed out the requirements of this law, suppose when these notes had been presented for redemption he had redeemed them in gold and silver or in silver, according to an option that would have been in the interest of the Government, how many times does the Senator from New York suppose the notes would have been presented at the Treasury Department for redemption under those circumstances? Not more than once. When these gentlemen understood that the Secretary of the Treasury, following out the interest and wishes of the people of this country, would redeem the notes in silver, they would not have been presented the second time for redemption. And yet, sir, this has been made an excuse for the issuance of $163,000,000 of bonds within the last eighteen months. I suppose that within the next ten or twelve days we shall be invited to the feast of a new issuance of Government bonds to the amount of $100,000,000 or more. The President of the United States and his Secretary of the Treasury have issued $163,000,000 of bonds, every dollar of which is void and was void when issued. There was no more authority in John G. Carlisle to issue the bonds of this Government than there was in me. There is not a statute upon our statute books, there is not a line or syllable of law that confers upon him authority to issue Government bonds. They were void and are absolutely void to-day; and while the people of this country as a matter of honor will protect them now, as I believe they should be protected in view of the fact that we have had their money, I believe the time is coming when the people of this country will rise up in their might and hurl from power every man who undertakes and does usurp power such as has been usurped in this case. The Secretary of the Treasury issued those bonds without authority. The act of 1875 was repealed by the act of May 31, 1878, and yet I am told that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is at work getting out more bonds, bonds to be issued without any limitation whatever, bonds to be used in extending the national banking system over this country and fastening upon the institutions of this country that system of banking which takes from the Government the sovereign power vested in it to coin and issue money and invests it in private corporations and private individuals.

I simply rose, Mr. President, not to review at length, as I shall have occasion to do before the present session is over, and carefully, the utterances of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury upon this question, but I did not propose that the senior Senator from New York should put his speech in the RECORD without some kind of a contradiction of the facts upon which its rests. There is not now, there never has been in the history of this country to this moment, a note or a bond redeemable in gold—not one. Yet the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, by violating the law of this country, have made these notes redeemable in gold.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during sessions of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate consent to the unfinished business being laid aside?

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. HILL. There have been three distinct protests entered here to-day against the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, and it is not a very good day for protests either. The first came from the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who protested that the proposition which I submitted, as well as the remarks which I made, in some way, shape, or manner, were an attack upon the public credit of this country. The Senator is entirely mistaken. The proposition which I submitted was for the very purpose of the maintenance of the credit of the United States.

I do not intend to detain the Senate with any elaborate argument upon the question whether the bonds to be issued in the future should be payable in gold or silver, but I have simply the suggestion to make that the provision that they should be paid in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in either metal is in aid of the public credit at this time, and not against it, and I think no one knew that better than the distinguished Senator from Colorado. But the difficulty with the Senator seems to be that every time a suggestion is made upon the subject of gold it interferes, as he thinks, with his favorite theory upon the silver question, and therefore he must necessarily antagonize it.

This proposition can stand, and when the Senator comes to examine my remarks he will find that they were carefully made, and I am willing to stand upon every line of them. The proposition submitted is not the proposition or recommendation contained wholly in the President's message or in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. There are some views which I expressed which are the same as theirs. I am not going to disavow them because I entertained them years ago. I pressed them in this Chamber a year ago in January last, upon this very point, before either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury had made any suggestion whatever upon the subject.

Mr. President, I do not know precisely what the Senator from Colorado means, unless he intends to be offensive, by his statement that in the propositions and suggestions I have made somebody was a tidewaiter. I hardly think the Senator in his cooler moments——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. The allusion I made to a tidewaiter certainly had no reference to the Senator. What I meant to say was that under this Administration there has grown up a system by which every fellow who stands at the door of the Treasury Department seems to understand that he is connected officially with the Department and is authorized to instruct the American people on finance, and so we get it from the Secretary down, I said, to the tidewaiter. I had no reference whatever to the Senator from New York.

If I may interrupt him a moment further, I will say that even the officer whose duty is purely or almost mechanical—to fabricate coin—is daily in the public press, telling us what ought to be the policy of the United States, and various subordinates of the Treasury Department have been from time to time enlightening the Senate and the country upon what should be the proper financial policy and criticising the policy of all who did not agree with their chief. That is what I referred to, and it had no reference at all to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I, of course, am not responsible for the utterances of the Director of the Mint, who I assume to be the gentleman to whom the Senator refers. I am one of those, I think, who doubted the policy of his appointment; but I can not now go into the secrets of executive sessions. I suppose he has a right officially to discuss the financial question. He is probably as competent to do so as gentlemen who hail from the wilds of Colorado. The President has given him an important office, and he is discharging his duties, I assume, satisfactorily. I have heard no particular complaint upon that subject.

Mr. President, I do not know of anyone especially who is hanging around the Treasury Department. The Senator said he did not refer to me. I think possibly I am the only Senator here who can say that I never but once entered the Treasury Department, and that was upon a simple errand—to accompany another Senator there.

I am not authorized to speak for the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not authorized to speak for the President of the United States. I speak for no one except myself, and I utter my own sentiments, and because the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States have seen fit to make certain recommendations in accordance with views I expressed here a year ago they can not crowd me off my own platform.

I have made an attack upon the public credit, says the distinguished Senator from Colorado. The Senator from Nebraska protests against it also. The Senator from North Carolina also entered another protest, and there is still room for more. The Senator from Colorado puts words into my mouth which I did not utter. I said I thought it would be wise to change this old law under which bonds could be issued, and finally he said he did not know but possibly that might be so; it might be wise enough to amend it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator explain——

Mr. HILL. One at a time. When I get through with the Senator from Colorado and his remarks, I will hear the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted the Senator from New York to state what the difference is, so far as the rate of interest the people pay is concerned, between selling a bond at a big premium and selling a bond at a lower rate without a premium. There is not a particle.

Mr. HILL. Of course there is none; but for the purpose of a popular loan taking bonds at a premium is not as feasible nor as practicable as to have the precise interest specified upon the face of the bond. Everybody knows that. Every practical financier will tell you that you can not negotiate bonds at a premium among the people with the same facility as bonds which specify on their face the true rate of interest which they bear, and where you do not have to rely upon a so-called premium in order to determine the particular interest allowed. That is the point I make. Every Senator here can understand it. It is easier to float Government or other bonds where, in order to compute the amount of interest they will pay, it is not necessary to take into account the premium. Therefore the suggestion I made was a proper one for that purpose, if for no other. It was proper for another purpose, namely, for the purpose of investing the Secretary of the Treasury with discretion to issue gold or silver bonds. Senators may not agree with me upon that proposition. I submit it simply for their consideration. I assail no man's motives because he disagrees with me; but whether he disagrees with me or not, this is not an attack upon the public credit; far from it.

The Senator from Nebraska seems to supplement the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. His complaint against this proposition is that the Secretary of the Treasury should pay silver not only for Sherman Treasury notes, but also for United States greenback notes. That is the way he would protect the Treasury of the United States. Undoubtedly that is precisely what the Senator from North Carolina means. That is undoubtedly what the Senator from Colorado means. They would protect the Treasury and the credit of the United States by attempting to pay not only the Sherman and United States notes, but these bonds in silver coin. What kind of protection would that be in this emergency?

Mr. MORGAN. Good.

Mr. HILL. My suggestion was in the line of the protection of the public credit, and not to undermine it.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from New York if it is not true that the greenbacks were redeemable in gold and silver or in coin, and at the time they were issued were not both gold and silver coined and capable of redeeming those notes?

Mr. HILL. There was very little silver, indeed, being coined at the time those notes were issued.

Mr. ALLEN. Greenbacks were issued in 1862 and 1863?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Silver was money of final redemption equal to gold until 1873. Will the Senator not only answer that question, but answer this question: Where a statute imposes upon a public officer a discretion, is not that discretion always to be exercised in the interest of the public? The Sherman Act investing in the Secretary of the Treasury the power to redeem the Sherman notes in either gold or silver coin at his discretion, is it not, according to all precedent, the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem in silver when that becomes necessary for the protection of the Treasury Department?

Mr. HILL. The difficulty with that proposition is simply that in the same law to which the Senator refers it is stated further on, and as a part of it, that it was the duty of the Government to maintain the parity of the two metals.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the way to maintain it.

Mr. HILL. With the present condition of the silver market, in my humble judgment, it could not be done by the payment of those bonds in silver, irrespective of any legal question. I am not going to discuss the abstract question here or enter much into it. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that we understand precisely what these Senators want and what their grievance is against me because I offer a counter proposition. They want to pay off the United States Treasury notes in silver and thereby help the credit of the country! Because I have suggested a different proposition, or one that varies from that, namely, the issuing of bonds payable in gold or silver, at the discretion of the holders, it is said I have made an attack upon the credit of the Government.

Mr. President, Senators attack Mr. Carlisle. They complain of his doing what has been done by every Secretary of the Treasury for the last fifteen years, and they know it, or should know it. There was no criticism made of previous Secretaries of the Treasury because they maintained the gold reserve. I suppose the next thing we shall hear is that there is no authority for a gold reserve at all. I hold in my hand the statute which speaks of the gold reserve, and refers to it as "the gold reserve." It has become a part and parcel of the statutes of the United States. The precise, technical authority under which the gold reserve was first established is perhaps difficult to ascertain, but it has grown up with our system and is a part of it; it is a legal gold reserve, so considered by the Government and so considered by every official of the Government; and now these Senators do not wish that gold reserve protected. That is the idea.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the statute to which he refers—section 12 of the act of 1882, extending bank charters—simply incidentally in three or four lines recognizes a gold reserve. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that gold reserve was established in 1879, when there was not a statute upon the statute book authorizing it, and there never has been one since.

Mr. HILL. We shall next hear that there is no Secretary of the Treasury and no Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Practically that is true.

Mr. HILL. The gold reserve has been established by law and by recognition of the authority of the Treasury. It is interwoven in the statutes of the United States; it is there; it is to be protected; and, without intending to be offensive, I will suggest to Senators if they destroy that, they must admit that to a large extent they will injure the credit of the United States.

It would be an idle waste of words for me to argue here now about the propriety of the preservation of the gold reserve. I supposed that was elementary, and that no Senator at this date in the history of our finances would rise and argue that the gold reserve should not be preserved. I supposed that the only difference between us was as to the precise method of maintaining it, not as to the real fact itself.

Mr. President, the other day the Senator from Colorado appeared as the champion of the President when the great war message was sent here for the action of this Congress, and so anxious was the Senator to have the bill passed which was then introduced, for an appropriation of money, that he was willing to have it acted upon without even a reference to a committee. He then praised the loyalty of the President of the United States and used fine-spun words about his patriotism and his keen discernment of his duty. The Senator then assumed to be the champion of the present Administration. It does not make any difference whether the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other official is or is not in favor of this precise proposition.

I sustain these officials when I think they are right. I oppose them when I think they are wrong. That is the precise platform upon which I stand. I do not propose to keep up a constant fire against these officials because I do not always agree with them; but upon this question of the retirement of the greenback currency I think they are correct, and I propose to express my opinion as freely as the Senator from Colorado or other Senators here. I have heard no real argument in answer to the proposition. We may probably hear one next week, but it would be dignifying the opposing remarks made here to-day to say that they were an answer to the proposition which has been submitted by me for our consideration.

This question must be met, and of course there will be ample time to discuss it. The country must have some relief. In my judgment the best relief to be afforded at the present time is to be found in this resolution. It may or may not meet the approval of the Senate; it is immaterial to me. I discharge my duty by its presentation. It is no attack on the credit of the United States. On the contrary, it is an effort to maintain it, and I think it marks out the true and correct course which this Government ought to pursue.

INCOME TAXES.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to call up the joint resolution that I introduced this morning, recalling its reference to the Judiciary Committee, with the permission of the Senate. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 35) to amend the Constitution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States for ratification or rejection, to wit:

ARTICLE XVI.

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to direct taxes and the apportionment thereof among the several States in proportion to the census enumeration shall not apply to income taxes; but the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on all incomes regardless of the source from which the income is derived or acquired: Provided, however, that all income taxes which the Congress may lay and collect shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to request that the resolution lie on the table for a few days.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be printed, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed, under the rule, and lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the substitute which I offered to the joint resolution of the Senator from New York be printed also?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An order to print will be entered.

BATTLE SHIPS FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. QUAY. I offer a resolution calling for information from the Navy Department. I suppose there will be no objection to it, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether in his opinion it would be advantageous to the naval service to now contract for six battle ships, instead of for the two at present authorized, on the basis of the bids now before the Navy Department, modified as might be in the opinion of the Department to the public interest.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

INCREASE OF COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I give notice under the rule of an amendment in the Senate rules in paragraph 9, line 9, page 153, Rule XXV, by striking out the words in the lines "A Committee on Commerce, to consist of thirteen members," and inserting the following:

"Resolved, That the Committees on Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, Judiciary, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, and Interstate Commerce shall each consist of fifteen members.

"Second. That until each of the Senators shall be assigned to one of the before-mentioned committees no Senator shall be a member of more than one of the said committees.

"Third. That five members shall constitute a quorum of the said committees.

"A Committee on Commerce created, which shall be charged with all questions which concern the foreign commerce of the United States and the improvement of the tide-water harbors of the United States.

"A Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which shall be charged with the consideration of all bills for the improvement of rivers and inland lakes and harbors, which shall consist of fifteen members, of which five shall constitute a quorum."

Mr. ALDRICH. Unless the Senator from Florida desires to submit some remarks upon the resolution, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CALL. I ask that it be printed and lie over, and afterwards I shall be willing that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. I do not know that I shall have a word to say upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and lie over under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 56) to transfer certain offices of the United States in the Territory of Utah to the officers of the State of Utah; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that on Monday next at the conclusion of the morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I desire to address to them a few remarks on the joint resolution which I introduced on the second day of the session, affirming the Monroe doctrine.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF OFFICES TO THE STATE OF UTAH.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the immediate consideration of House joint resolution No. 56, which passed the House of Representatives unanimously and is now on the table of the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 56) to transfer certain offices of the United States in the Territory of Utah to the officers of the State of Utah was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT. Let it be read at length.

Mr. FAULKNER. I see no objection to the joint resolution. It is strictly in accordance with all former resolutions in relation to the admission of States.

Mr. BERRY and others. Let it be read.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Idaho explain what is to be accomplished by it?

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator will understand the object of the resolution when it is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the governor and secretary of the Territory of Utah be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, upon the issuance of Executive proclamation declaring Utah a State, to deliver to the then governor and secretary of the State of Utah, for the use and benefit of said State, the safes, desks, and all furniture and fixtures of their respective offices, and all property of like character belonging to the United States, under control of the secretary, including that held by the Board known as the Utah Commission.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 30, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 27, 1895.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 27, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under Rule XXIV, clause 2, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Trinity River, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of preliminary examination of Colorado River, Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the case of Cornelius Boyle and Thaddeus Snyder against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 2720) making Palm Beach, Fla., a subport of entry and delivery.

PROTECTION OF THE COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to make a favorable report on a bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue; which I ask to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 56) to transfer certain offices of the United States in the Territory of Utah to the officers of the State of Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 32) authorizing and directing the acceptance of the ram Katahdin, thereby making said ram a part of the United States Navy; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, M'GANN VS. BELKNAP.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to report from Committee No. 1 on Elections the action of the committee in the case of Belknap against McGann. The report cites the fact that the committee took up the case this morning, the parties being before them, and an oral statement was made by Mr. McGann to the effect that Mr. Belknap was duly elected. The committee, therefore, unanimously adopted a resolution that Mr. McGann was not elected, and Mr. Belknap was, and have signed a report recommending that a resolution to that effect be adopted by the House. We also commend the action of Mr. McGann and his fairness and justice in appearing before the committee and making the statement he did, and the committee desire the House to add their commendation of the conduct of Mr. McGann in this respect. I present the unanimous report, signed by all the members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the report to be read?

Mr. DANIELS. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

The Committee No. 1 of Elections, at a regular meeting of said committee, at the committee room in the Capitol, on the 27th day of December, 1895, were attended by Hugh R. Belknap, contestant, and his counsel, and by Lawrence E. McGann in person, and the contest between the said contestant and contestee regularly came on for hearing and the contest being presented on the papers and briefs furnished on behalf of said contestant and contestee and on the oral statement of the contestee, who conceded the election of the contestant as a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from and for the Third Congressional district of the State of Illinois, and with the assent of the contestant and the contestee resolutions to that effect were unanimously adopted by the said committee. The committee unanimously add their commendation of the fairness and justice of the action of the contestee and recommend that it shall be cordially approved by the action of the House as very high evidence of his character and standing and fairness. All of which is respectfully submitted.

December 27, 1895.

CHARLES DANIELS, Chairman.
L. W. ROYSE.
ROMULUS Z. LINNEY.
S. S. TURNER.
FRED C. LEONARD.
WILLIAM H. MOODY.
EDWARD D. COOKE.
HUGH A. DINSMORE.
CHARLES L. BARTLETT.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] presents the following resolutions, which will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Lawrence E. McGann was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Illinois, and is not entitled to a seat in said Congress as the Representative of that district, and agreeably to the recommendation of the committee the conduct and character of the said contestee are hereby approved and commended as eminently just and proper by this House.

Resolved, That Hugh R. Belknap was elected a Representative to and in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Illinois, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress as the Representative of the Third Congressional district of the State of Illinois.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of these resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

SWEARING IN OF MR. BELKNAP.

Mr. DANIELS. I move now that the contestant be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Belknap, will present himself.

Mr. Belknap came forward and took the oath of office.

PRINTING FOR ELECTIONS COMMITTEE NO. 3.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 3 be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of that committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the following resolution as a substitute for one introduced and referred to that committee on December 23.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the House to call up for debate a bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means entitled "A bill to maintain and protect the coin-reserve fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue," the previous question being considered as ordered; that at 5 p. m. this day a recess be taken until 7 p. m., when the session shall continue until 10 p. m.; that debate shall be resumed immediately after reading the Journal Saturday, December 28; and that the vote shall be taken at 3 p. m. on the bill without delay or other motion, separate votes being taken on each section, if demanded; and that leave to print be granted for ten days.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the previous question will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Iowa desire to explain the resolution?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no desire to at present. If the gentleman from Georgia does, I will reserve my time.

Mr. CRISP. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House again to the impropriety of the course pursued by the majority, and to appeal to committees, in justice to themselves, to have a little more care and consideration in preparing bills to present to the House. Now, I understand, Mr. Speaker, that nothing I can say in opposition to any bill reported from the committee would have any effect upon that side. I understand that. And yet I want to say that your own experience as to the two bills which have already been reported ought to induce you to make haste a little more slowly. Let us see what has been done. You have disposed of a general tariff bill in one day. There are very few, if any, members on that side or this who understand the scope of the bill, or the effect it will have on particular industries, the amount of importations affected by the bill, and what amount of revenue it would produce; and then, as I understand, you have passed a bill referring to an act as going into effect on a certain day, when that act did not go into effect on that day. This may or may not be true; that question ought to have been determined by the Committee on Ways and Means, and would have been but for the unseemly haste observed by that committee. Then we considered the bill under a rule which prevented the amendment of the bill in any particular; so that no errors, however apparent, could be corrected.

At the session of the Ways and Means Committee at which this bill was agreed upon there was a bond bill authorized to be reported. I had supposed until this morning the bond bill had been reported to the House. I had supposed so, because the fact was stated in the newspapers, and from the newspapers the minority of the committee have obtained most of the information they have received as to what is to be done and what has been done. But we learned this morning that bill had not in fact been reported to the House, although its report had been authorized. When members read the reports in the papers and saw what report the Committee on Ways and Means had authorized to be made there began to be murmurs on that side. There began to be criticisms on that side, and when that side murmurs, and the murmurs are sufficiently numerous to endanger the passage of the bill, a pause is had. In this case it was discovered, whether so intended or not, the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means might result in the retirement of the greenbacks.

We had criticised the bill; we had suggested to the gentlemen that its effect would be to retire the greenbacks. What we say has no weight, but when murmurs came from that side the committee is called to correct the error. They claim it was an error, and I give them credit for the statement. They assembled to correct an error which by reason of great haste they had committed, and now they report a bill providing expressly against the retirement of the greenbacks. How carelessly and negligently are we proceeding!

How much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five and one-half minutes and has fourteen and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. CRISP. I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] whether there are to be any further observations made on that side?

Mr. CRISP. I wish to yield five or six minutes to my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. HENDERSON. Let him be heard, then.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is his purpose to yield to anyone else on his side, or to consume the time himself in closing the debate?

Mr. HENDERSON. I was going to ask for a vote; what I may do after the gentleman from Texas has made his observations I do not yet know.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the justice of our criticism against the general methods of procedure which prevailed in the Fifty-first Congress, it is certain that the sober judgment of the country has approved the effort to expedite the public business which it inaugurated and which the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses completed. Personally I do not grudge any man or any party proper credit for this achievement, though it is my judgment that the credit is mainly due to the American people, whose common sense, without distinction of party, had long before condemned the practice of continuing the debate upon public questions simply to postpone the decision of them. Our constituents were quicker than their representatives to perceive the folly of a legislative body adopting rules which rendered it powerless to legislate; and after the first irritation, which innovation always excites, had passed away, all of us were ready to agree that the privilege of debate had been grossly abused and that the abuse ought to have been corrected. But, sir, while we have remedied one evil, we are about to fall into another which is still more serious.

Having adopted rules under which a vote can be reached, we are verging upon an opinion that a vote is the only desideratum, and that debate is a useless waste of time. This error, sir, is more mischievous than the one which we have abandoned. It was foolish, I grant you, to debate without deciding; but it is dangerous to decide without debating. There is a happy mean, where, after a full discussion, there can be a prompt conclusion, and it is that happy mean which it is the duty of every member on this floor to earnestly assist in establishing. If the rule which we adopted yesterday and the one which we are asked to adopt to-day are to become precedents, this House of Representatives must soon sink to a level with the infamous Corps Législatif. We will soon be required by practice, as it was by law, to accept or reject the bills which our committees present to us without the right of expressing our opinions or of proposing amendments.

Yesterday the majority forced through this House a bill raising the tariff upon every article except one now subject to a customs duty, and which assessed an additional tax of $45,000,000 against the consumers of this country. That, sir, is more than 80 per cent of all the taxes collected by the Federal Government in the year which immediately preceded the civil war; and yet, with less than four hours' debate, and without an opportunity of amendment, you have imposed this enormous burden upon an already overtaxed constituency. To-day you propose to authorize an increase of the public debt which the youngest among us will probably not live to see extinguished, and you propose to spend the energies of the next generation without allowing a reasonable time for debate, and without giving any opportunity at all for amendment. Mr. Speaker, I admonish gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that this country will no more tolerate their unseemly haste than it did the inexcusable delay of our predecessors.

There is nothing, sir, that justifies this precipitate action. "The seriousness of the situation" about which we have heard so much has been exaggerated, as well by the special message of the President as by the ill-considered measures of the majority. The condition which has been thus unduly accentuated as a grave national crisis consists mainly in a disturbance of the New York stock market. It ought not, sir, to arouse either surprise or apprehension in the mind of any man who will give it a second thought that recent events should have influenced some foreign holders to sell their American securities. The possibility of a war between the United States and Great Britain would inevitably dispose British subjects to sell, because such a war would probably mean confiscation to them in the end. I can easily understand that these sales would tend to depress the price of similar offerings, but I do not understand that this is necessarily an evil. If foreign creditors, either through timidity or in the hope of coercing this Government, see fit to sacrifice their debts against us, the loss is theirs and the profit is ours. Some of our own citizens, it is true, have suffered in the decline, but few of them deserve any sympathy, because, with rare exception, they are mere gamblers, whose trade it is to buy what they never expect to receive and to sell what they never intend to deliver; and it is a monstrous outrage that the great commercial, industrial, and agricultural interests of the country should be imperiled by the fear of a panic simply because the stock jobbers are at each other's throats.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a protest, though I know that it will be unavailing, against the method by which these exceedingly important matters are being considered and disposed of by this House. Yesterday, with only a few hours' debate and no opportunity to amend, you forced through a hastily constructed, ill-advised, and blundering tariff bill which affected all our industries, and imposed $44,000,000 taxes annually. With equal precipitancy, with as little excuse, you propose to go forward now and increase the bonded indebtedness of this country without giving the representatives of the people any opportunity to amend the bill by which it is to be done. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the rule adopted yesterday and the one proposed to-day are peculiar in their phraseology. Instead of providing that after 3 o'clock to-morrow the previous question shall be considered as ordered, this rule provides that the previous question shall be ordered when the rule is adopted, so that members vote in advance that even if debate gives out they will not use whatever remaining time there may be in offering amendments. They vote to make amendments utterly impossible. Why is it that a Republican Committee on Rules and a Republican Committee on Ways and Means are afraid of a two-thirds Republican majority? If they can not trust such a majority, how dare the people trust them?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Ways and Means are both learning a little by experience. They both confess to-day that they blundered yesterday. On the day before yesterday, without allowing us to offer amendments in the Committee on Ways and Means, they prepared the measure that has been reported to-day. This morning, in hot haste, we are assembled in committee, after it is ascertained that a great blunder has been made by which all the greenbacks would be destroyed. Yet the committee stood ready yesterday morning to force that bill through the House to-day. Why not allow members an opportunity to amend if they desire to do so? There are still many defects and crudities. Mr. Speaker, I have noticed in some of my reading that a celebrated Indian chief who roamed the plains of the West had a very peculiar and appropriate name, "Young man afraid of his horses." I wonder, sir, whether we have any such chief here on this occasion, and whether those in authority on the other side dare not trust the majority in whose hands they find themselves? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] It is a poor commentary on a majority of over one hundred that it can not be trusted to even offer an amendment, that it can not be trusted to participate in a five-minute debate, that it can not be trusted to deliberate, that it can not be trusted to do anything but vote; and then the motion to be voted on must be cut and dried and offered to them in toto before they can do anything with it. And passing strange it is that the majority itself confesses the fact by every act. If gentlemen on the other side are willing to accept that as a proper measurement of their qualifications as legislators, the country will look out and see that others are sent here in their places who have different qualities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] used all his time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has three minutes left.

Mr. CRISP. I do not care to use the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I ask a vote.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution,

The SPEAKER said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 102, not voting 57; as follows:

CHANGE OF MEMBERSHIP, COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that Mr. GRAFF of Illinois wishes to be excused from service on the Committee on Mines and Mining. Without objection, he will be excused. [A pause.] There being no objection, the Chair appoints as a member of that committee Mr. HATCH of Indiana.

BONDS AND CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill which is now before the House for consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2004) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," he is authorized from time to time, at his discretion, to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to an amount sufficient for the object stated in this section, bearing not to exceed 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in coin, after five years from their date, and payable in fifteen years after their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said act for the bonds therein authorized. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes." Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875, he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That to provide for any temporary deficiency now existing, or which may hereafter occur, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States, to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, payable in three years after their date to the bearer in lawful money of the United States, of the denomination of $20, or multiples thereof, with annual coupons for interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and to sell and dispose of the same for not less than an equal amount of lawful money of the United States at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States and at such post-offices as he may select. And such certificates shall have the like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said resumption act for the bonds therein authorized. And the proceeds thereof shall be used for the purpose prescribed in this section and for no other.

Mr. DINGLEY took the floor.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Before the gentleman from Maine proceeds I suggest that he occupy during his remarks some position nearer to the center of the Hall than where h e now stands At this distance we have difficulty in hearing him from his pres ent position; and if it is agreeable to him to make the change suggested, he would oblidge us by doing so.

Mr. DINGLEY. As my papers are right here, I prefer to speak from this place.

The SPEAKER. If the House will be in order, the gentleman from Maine can be heard.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before the debate opens, let me say I take it for granted the time is to be distributed by the Speaker, there being no other arrangement. I should like to know whether that is the understanding, because gentlemen are coming to me for time and I have referred them to the Speaker, supposing that would be the arrangement to-day. In the absence of any other arrangement that, of course, will be the mode of proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will proceed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill contains two simple propositions. Section 2 (reversing the order in which the sections are placed in the bill) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, to be paid within three years, bearing 3 per cent interest—to be used for one purpose and one purpose only—to meet temporary deficiencies in revenue—temporary deficiencies—deficiencies that may occur not only now, but at any future time, for this second section is to be permanent law.

I have only to say in respect to that section that it is in substance the exchequer-bill system which prevails under many Governments, and is intended to be a form of loan for temporary purposes, of a popular nature, that can be paid out even by the Secretary of the Treasury for current objects of expenditure. The committee have provided that these certificates of indebtedness shall be used only for that purpose. Our object in so limiting their use is to separate as far as possible in the accounts, the cash in the Treasury available for current expenses, and the reserve that is retained for redemption purposes.

One great difficulty we have had in maintaining the redemption fund in the past, as I suggested yesterday, arises from the fact that the reserve or redemption fund has been used not exclusively for the purpose for which it was established, but in part to meet the deficiency in the revenue; and therefore it seemed to the Committee on Ways and Means desirable that there should be two forms of obligations—one temporary in its character, in the form of certificates of indebtedness to meet merely temporary deficiencies, and to be set aside and to be devoted to that purpose entirely; and another to maintain the redemption fund with a provision that the proceeds of that obligation should be set aside as a reserve and so maintained, in order that if we are to continue to use circulating notes of the Government as currency—as we have been doing for thirty years—we may maintain the same financial condition that a bank does in permanently maintaining its reserve and not allowing it to be encroached upon for merely current expenditures.

This section, as I have said, is intended to present a remedy not simply for present exigencies, but for any possible exigencies that may arise in the future, and in the judgment of the Committee on Ways and Means it ought to be on the statute books without reference to the existing situation.

Passing now, Mr. Speaker, to section 1 of the bill, it simply proposes to add another description of bonds to those already authorized by existing law for the maintenance of the redemption fund. Under the resumption act of 1875 two descriptions of bonds are authorized, namely, ten-year bonds bearing 5 per cent interest, and thirty-year bonds bearing 4 per cent interest. These are the only two descriptions of bonds authorized and that have been issued under the resumption act.

Under that act the Secretary of the Treasury during the past two years has issued one hundred millions of 5 per cent ten-year bonds and sixty-two and one-third millions of 4 per cent thirty-year bonds, realizing from the sale about $182,000,000 in gold. He has the authority to continue to issue such bonds for the purpose of maintaining the redemption fund under the resumption act to-day. He has been exercising that authority, and has indicated in his report that if there is no further authority given to him—no other description of bonds authorized—if the exigency arises, which it will, evidently, in a very short time, he will proceed to issue, sell, and dispose of additional bonds bearing interest at 4 per cent, with thirty years to run, or bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent, with ten years to run. With that authority on the statute books to-day, this bill simply provides for the authorization of the issuance of another description of bonds for the same purpose, and that is a 3 per cent bond, redeemable five years after date and payable after fifteen years from date.

The only practical question involved, then, in this first section of the bill is simply this, shall we, in the interest of the Treasury—in the interest of economy—authorize the issuance of bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, to wit, 3 per cent, when we know that if we have no legislation the Secretary of the Treasury will proceed to issue either a ten-year 5 per cent bond or a thirty-year 4 per cent bond?

Now, it seems to me that in this situation, as practical men representing the interests of the taxpayers of this country, when the simple question is presented whether or not we will issue the lower rate bonds, in the face of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to issue a higher rate of bonds, we ought to act as legislators here precisely as we would act in our own business, and to that extent defend and protect the interests of the people, and thus authorize the lower rate bond.

There are two points of legislation presented in the first section of the bill that relate not only to the proposed issuance of 3 per cent bonds, but which also relate to any other issue that may be made hereafter under the resumption act of 1875 of either of the other descriptions of bonds that I have referred to. The first provision is that whatever bonds are sold, or offered for sale, whether they are the bonds authorized under the resumption act of 1875 or those to be authorized by the bill now pending, they shall be first offered to the people of the United States by advertisement, and that our own people shall have an opportunity to purchase such bonds if they so desire. It seems to me that some such provision ought to accompany this legislation, and not only that it should accompany this legislation, but it ought to also apply to the resumption act of 1875. The loans, whether issued under the resumption act or under this bill, should be of a character; for I believe that when a 3 per cent bond of this character shall be offered, as is proposed by this bill, to the people of the United States, they will respond from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf.

I believe that the people of the United States, with the opportunity thus offered, will come forward with millions upon millions of gold which is now hoarded, for there can be little doubt that $500,000,000 of gold is in this country outside of the Treasury fund and bank reserves, and hence I should deprecate beyond measure the defeat of a bill like this, which proposes simply to authorize the issue of a lower description of bond, and at the same time proposes to require that all bonds issued shall first be offered to the people of the United States.

Second. There is another provision of legislation in this first section, and that is that the proceeds of the bonds thus sold under this act and under the resumption act of 1875 shall be devoted, as was intended when the act was passed, and as ought to be made clear, exclusively to redemption purposes.

It was supposed that in using that language it would not be understood that it authorized in any way the retirement and cancellation of the United States legal-tender notes; but to make that clear, to put it beyond dispute, carrying out precisely the object that the committee had when they first drafted this bill, the committee have placed in the bill itself, immediately after this direction that the proceeds shall be used for this one purpose, a proviso that nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or to modify the act of May 31, 1878, which forbids the further retirement and cancellation of United States legal-tender notes.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], who spoke a short time ago, informed the House, as I understood him, that the Committee on Ways and Means had been hastily assembled this morning to correct a blunder, as he said, and that it was announced that it had been ascertained that the language used in the first draft of the bill would authorize the retirement and cancellation of the greenbacks. There was no such announcement or thought.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If my friend from Maine will permit an interruption, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. I will.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman mistook my remark.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes. I did not say that it had been "announced."

Mr. DINGLEY. I understood the gentleman to use the word "announced."

Mr. MCMILLIN. No.

Mr. DINGLEY. I accept the explanation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not say that. There was no such announcement made so far as I was concerned. On the other hand, it is but fair to state that I failed to get my notice of the meeting of the committee, and was not there, and could not have made the statement that the gentleman attributes to me. I said it had been ascertained. I suppose it has been ascertained.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is well understood that that provision was put in because gentlemen on the other side and some others had given a construction to this provision never intended, and one to which it was not justly susceptible. Having ascertained this fact, the committee, in order to carry out their own original intentions, have put in a proviso which renders their purpose beyond any question. So much for that.

It is not the intention of this legislation to do anything more than to provide that the proceeds of bonds sold under the resumption act, or the proceeds of the additional description of bonds provided for here, shall be used for the one purpose for which the law authorizes them; and I think there can be no one present who does not realize the propriety of such legislation as this. Bonds that are sold in the markets of this country and the world ostensibly for the purpose of maintaining the redemption fund should not have their proceeds used for the purpose of meeting deficiencies in revenue. Let us have the reserve maintained as a reserve, and whenever bonds or certificates of indebtedness are sold, the proceeds of which are to be used for the purpose of meeting deficiencies in the revenue, let them be sold for that purpose, so that there can be no evasion of the point as there was during the discussion yesterday, when it was stated that we have not been borrowing money to meet the deficiency in the Treasury. Let the proceeds of the bonds sold to maintain the redemption fund be separated from the proceeds of certificates of indebtedness sold to meet any deficiency, which is what is intended to be done by the operation of the bill which is pending.

There can be no more fatal policy than that which calls upon the people of this country to contribute the proceeds of loans ostensibly made to maintain the resumption fund on which the credit of the Treasury stands to meet current deficiencies of revenue. Such a policy promotes distrust. Capital is always timid. If it obtains the impression that what we call the reserve is not a reserve, but that it is to be drawn upon, as it has been drawn upon during the past two and a half years, to meet current deficiencies, capital at once takes alarm. A reserve is a distinct thing, and it is of the utmost importance that it should be maintained without any attempt to divert it to other purposes; and the most important part of this legislation, I want to say to my friends on this side of the House, lies in the fact that if this bill shall pass it will compel the separation of the accounts, and the reserve will and must be treated as a reserve, not to be trenched upon to meet current deficiencies of revenues. And when there is any necessity to have money to meet a deficiency of revenue, then the resort must be had to another source to supply that deficiency of revenue.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there, for information?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will.

Mr. MARSH. Under the provisions of this bill, if it becomes law and the greenbacks shall be redeemed with the proceeds of these bonds, what becomes of the greenbacks?

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely what became of them all the time from 1884 upward until 1893, when we had a large surplus revenue. If there had been a run upon the Treasury, it could have temporarily held them for the purpose of protecting the reserve. But if there was not a run upon the Treasury, then the surplus greenbacks would be used just as they were from 1884 until 1893, for the purpose of paying off a portion of the public interest-bearing debt.

Mr. MARSH. I am very glad to hear that answer from the gentleman from Maine. Will you allow me to ask you one further question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. You have stated in your speech here that during the last two and a half years the proceeds of the sales of bonds under the redemption law of 1875 have been used by the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. Now, one moment. Do you mean to say that the gold received as the proceeds of the sales of bonds has been paid out for the expenses of the Government, or do you mean to say that the greenbacks redeemed by that gold have been paid out?

Mr. DINGLEY. I mean to say this——

Mr. MARSH. I want to know the facts.

Mr. DINGLEY (continuing). The Treasury has redeemed

$133,000,000 of greenbacks by paying out gold obtained from these loans of which I have spoken, and has immediately taken these $133,000,000 of greenbacks and paid them out to meet the deficiency, and thus has furnished a second time to persons who wanted to draw gold from the Treasury the means of drawing from the Treasury another $133,000,000 of gold. That is what I mean.

Mr. MARSH. And hence the law which we passed yesterday to supply the deficiency in the revenues?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this seems to be——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly; although I do not care to use time which others ought to have.

Mr. COX. Now, why do you provide in the first section of this bill that the bonds that shall be issued shall be paid in coin?

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, that has been the provision in all laws which have been enacted for the issuance of bonds.

Mr. COX. Why do you provide in the issue of certificates that they shall be paid in lawful money?

Mr. DINGLEY. Because they will be paid out for current obligations and only be used for a short time.

Mr. COX. Then you provide two kinds of redemption money in the same bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. No. The certificates of indebtedness are not redemption money. They are not legal tender.

Mr. COX. They will have the same qualities as the greenback?

Mr. DINGLEY. No. A greenback is a legal tender.

Mr. COX. Then you are going to issue certificates that are not a legal tender?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly. They are interest bearing, and, being interest bearing, they will be used the same as any other interest-bearing obligation, namely, as an investment. There is a great difference between a certificate of indebtedness which is simply an interest-bearing obligation and a noninterest-bearing demand note, which is a legal tender and therefore passes from hand to hand as a medium of exchange.

Mr. MARSH. In the same connection and for the purpose of eliciting information, not for the purpose of annoying the gentleman, I will ask him to state to the House how the proceeds of these bonds for redemption purposes can pile up in the Treasury? What is there in this bill to prevent them from being used for the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government just as the Treasury has used such funds in the last two years and a half?

Mr. DINGLEY. If the second section of this bill should become a law, then only the proceeds of the certificates of indebtedness can be used to meet deficiencies of revenue, and the proceeds of bonds sold for the redemption fund can not be used to meet such deficiencies. When there is no deficiency few greenbacks will be presented for redemption, and those that are so presented can be used, just as they were from 1879 to 1893, to redeem and pay the interest-bearing debt. The intention, of course, is not to have any permanent deficiency of revenue. The second section is intended to apply only to temporary conditions which may arise and which do arise in all Governments; it is not intended to apply to a permanent, chronic deficiency that shall run two years and a half, as the present one has done. The purpose is simply to do what other Governments do under like circumstances. The intention is to avoid deficiencies by providing revenue. That is the normal condition of every Government. That is the policy which is contemplated by the legislation which we have already inaugurated in this House. But accidentally, through some unforeseen condition, there may be for a short time, when Congress is not in session, a deficiency of revenue, and at such a time the Secretary of the Treasury should have the means of laying hold upon some form of obligation that he can issue for the purpose of obtaining funds to meet that temporary condition. That is the intention of the second section.

Further, it is intended that obligations that are issued for the purpose of meeting temporary deficiencies of revenue shall run for only a short period; hence we limit the amount to $50,000,000. It is expected that such obligations will be paid by surplus revenue within a brief period, for the section provides that these certificates of indebtedness must be paid within three years. It is precisely the same thing that is done, for example, by Great Britain under certain conditions. She authorizes the issue of exchequer bills, which are almost exactly the same as what are here denominated certificates of indebtedness. Those bills are issued, under the British system, not for permanent loans, but to meet any temporary deficiency of revenue that may occur, and are paid in a comparatively short time from surplus revenues which Parliament is expected to provide.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman pardon one further inquiry?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield for the gentleman's question, though I am occupying time that I ought not to use.

Mr. COX. When you issue one of these certificates of indebtedness, what is it to be redeemed in?

Mr. DINGLEY. Lawful money.

Mr. COX. Now, why make that "lawful money" in the certificate and "coin" in the bond?

Mr. DINGLEY. Because we require a coin fund for redemption purposes; the law so provides. But current obligations of the Treasury we can pay in any kind of lawful money that may exist at the time.

There has been no bond issued by this Government up to this hour but that provides that it shall be paid, both principal and interest, in coin, and we are simply meeting the conditions of preexisting legislation. We have heretofore contracted these obligations, and we propose to meet them as an honorable people. But as to temporary deficiencies of revenue, where there has been no such previous obligation, they can always be paid in lawful money. How is the gentleman paid his salary as a member of this House? In lawful money, whatever that may be. But whenever you undertake to make a loan, and especially to borrow coin, you can not expect to obtain it unless you are ready to pay in the same kind of money that you borrow. We have always borrowed gold, and hence coin as used in our bonds means the same kind of coin that we have borrowed. It is because we have preserved good faith with our creditors that we have been able, up to within two years, to borrow on so favorable terms.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit a question in connection with the first section? That section provides that the proceeds of redemption of United States legal-tender notes shall be used for the redemption of legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Now, after they are thus redeemed and the notes get into the Treasury, does the gentleman think that this bill guards sufficiently against their being paid out to meet current expenses?

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, if the Secretary of the Treasury desires to so use them and finds that there is a necessity, there is no absolute provision otherwise in this bill. But the suggestion here, and it is a suggestion which is exceedingly important, is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt the policy of separating the two funds and shall use the greenbacks or any other forms of currency precisely as they were used from 1879 up to 1893. At one time during President Cleveland's first Administration there was in the Treasury of the United States $130,000,000 of greenbacks. They were the result in large part of deposits of United States legal-tender notes by banks retiring their circulation or going into liquidation. Those were gradually drawn out, but it took several years, and it was not until the act of July 12, 1890, was passed that those funds were turned into the Treasury. The same policy that prevailed from 1879 to 1893, provided we can have revenue sufficient to meet expenditures, will be repeated by the operations of the bill which is now before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to enter further into the discussion of collateral questions, because the points covered by this bill are exceedingly simple.

We need not enter into any discussion of the silver question. We need not enter into any discussion of any of the collateral questions relating either to finance or to the currency. They have no bearing here. We need not enter into a discussion of the propriety of establishing and maintaining a coin redemption fund for the purpose of maintaining United States legal-tender notes at par, as was done, under the operations of the act of 1875, in 1879. That is the established policy of the Government of the United States. That policy being established, and the law providing the requisite means for maintaining the redemption fund by a sale of bonds—and it was by a sale of ninety-five and one-half millions of bonds in 1878, in time of peace, that the redemption fund was first created—it is obvious that there is no other way of replenishing this fund when it is drawn upon by the presentation of United States legal-tender notes for redemption than by the sale of bonds, two descriptions of which, bearing 4 and 5 per cent interest, are now authorized to be issued and sold.

The only question really for us now is whether, in the interest of the people of this country, we shall not authorize the issue of a lower rate bond, and thus have the lower rate bond sold in preference to the higher rate bond, with the provision that when sold it shall be first offered to the people of this country, and the further provision that the proceeds shall be separated from ordinary cash in the Treasury and maintained as a reserve. That is all there is in this bill.

The provision as to certificates of indebtedness is a matter of no serious importance except in certain contingencies that may happen to any Government. There is not a Government on the face of the earth, except our own, which has not a provision for some form of certificate of indebtedness or exchequer bill to meet temporary and accidental deficiencies of revenue. We propose in this bill simply to give that authority which has been asked by the Secretary of the Treasury, which the Senate once unanimously gave, and which it seems to me ought to be on the statute book.

But at the same time we contemplate no deficiency, after a short time, if the legislation which this House has inaugurated shall be put upon the statute book.

It ought to be the policy of this Government, certainly, to maintain its revenues equal to and somewhat larger than its expenditures, but there should be at the same time a provision for the sale of some short-term obligations in case by accident or through some unexpected contingency there should be for a short time a deficiency of revenue.

We have adopted the policy of issuing and maintaining in our circulating medium $346,000,000 of United States legal-tender notes. They have been in our currency for a great many years. There is no intention at the present time, so far as I know, to take them from our currency. But being there, in order to make them as good as any other money you must do precisely what was done in 1879—maintain a coin redemption fund that shall give confidence not only to our own people, but to the whole world, that these Government notes will be redeemed in full-value coin whenever presented for redemption. And the maintenance of this fund lies at the very basis of the credit of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, no more fatal policy could have been inaugurated than that which was inaugurated in April, 1893, of allowing this coin redemption fund to fall below the minimum of $100,000,000, which public sentiment had marked as the line of demarcation between safety and danger. If that coin redemption fund had been maintained, and when there came up in April, 1893, the cloud of distrust over this country, if it had been increased by the sale then of $50,000,000 of bonds, our credit would have been safe; it would not have been disturbed, and the sale of bonds since that time, amounting to $113,000,000 in addition to the $50,000,000, would not have been necessary.

You must bear in mind that confidence in the credit of a government which issues its notes as currency is like confidence in a bank. It must rest upon something substantial, and that must be a coin redemption fund. So long as the people believe that there is behind the notes of a bank or behind the deposits of a savings bank or behind the notes of a Government a safe reserve, sufficient means that may be availed of at any moment for the purpose of meeting its obligations, there is no call on bank of issue or savings bank or on the treasury of the Government for the redemption of its notes. But let distrust come over the country, let it be believed that that redemption fund or that reserve fund is being trenched upon and allowed to fall below the line of safety, and at once distrust, inaugurated perhaps by some other cause, strengthens and grows from day to day on the failure to maintain the reserve. Could you expect, Mr. Speaker, that anything else than distrust, strengthening as the days and the months went on, would prevail when the people of this country and the capitalists of the world have seen the coin redemption fund upon which our credit rests greatly depleted, falling below the line of safety of $100,000,000, to $90,000,000, to $80,000,000, to $70,000,000, then to $60,000,000, and then to $50,000,000? Is it any wonder that alarm seized upon capital?

How is it with any bank of your own city or town, gentlemen? I remember a few years ago there was a run on a savings bank in a city not a thousand miles from my own residence. Some little distrust arose, and I remember that during the progress of that run (which continued but a single day) an excellent Quaker, a friend of mine, drove into town lashing his horse, and rushing into the bank, threw down his deposit book, saying, "I want my money." There was the treasurer sitting before him with a large roll of bills and a large pile of coin, and he immediately counted out the amount of my friend's deposit. The old Quaker looked at him a moment and exclaimed, "Thee has the money, has thee?" "Why, of course we have an abundance of money; we would be glad to have you take your money." "Well," said the old Quaker, "if thee has the money I don't want it, but if thee hasn't it I want it right off." [Laughter.] Now, that illustrates the basis of confidence. So long as your redemption fund is preserved, so long as it is maintained at the line which public opinion regards as the safety line, so long nobody wants your gold. But let that fund run below the limit of safety, as it has been running for two years and a half, and everybody wants his gold. If we can have proper care in the management of this redemption fund, and sufficient revenue, this reserve can be maintained and this distrust stopped.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman indulge me a moment?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUIGG. I am trying to catch the meaning which the gentleman attaches to the words "and for no other purpose." Of course that language does not interfere, as the gentleman has explained, with the continued use of the greenbacks?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, does the gentleman conceive that it will have the effect of maintaining the reserve at any given figure?

Mr. DINGLEY. It will have just this effect: It will have the effect of taking away part of the means by which the assault is made on the Treasury gold, and will have the effect of creating that condition of the market which will make the greenbacks more desirable than gold and stimulate the return of gold to the Treasury. Mr. Speaker, from 1879 to 1893 there was no run upon the Treasury gold. We had $100,000,000 of gold in the redemption fund all the time, and we maintained this fund all the time at that figure, the revenues being more than the expenditures, the country in a prosperous condition through the economic policy then prevailing, and when the industries of the country were prosperous nobody wanted gold. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We can return to the same condition only by a return to the same economic system which then prevailed. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. QUIGG. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not true also that considerable gold was exported at the time to which he refers?

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly. For several years there were large exportations of gold, and then large importations. That depends largely upon the balance of trade, which from 1876 to 1893 was in our favor every year except two. But even when we exported gold it came from the banks and not from the Treasury.

Mr. QUIGG. They simply did not use the Government as the conduit for getting the gold out.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. Whatever gold was required for export up to 1893 came from the banks of the country and not from the United States. It came through business channels in the regular legitimate way. The Government received nearly all gold for its duty on imports and paid its balances at the clearing house in gold.

Now, I say to you gentlemen, especially to gentlemen on this side of the House, that one of the remedies for the present unfortunate condition of the Treasury, next to the remedy which passed the House yesterday providing for more revenue, is that remedy which will maintain the redemption fund intact, in order that the people of this country and the capitalists of the world may have ocular evidence of the fact that we have the wherewith to maintain our Government notes at par.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Does the gentleman from Maine think that the issuance of the Sherman notes, which became an additional charge on the one hundred millions of gold reserve in the Treasury, had anything to do in bringing about the condition of affairs to which he has alluded?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do——

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not discussing that question now. When those notes were issued the coin reserve ought to have been increased. I am frank to say that. But I want to discuss this question as a business proposition, and not from any partisan standpoint whatever. I am not talking of who is responsible for the condition that prevails. I am simply counseling a return to the sound methods which prevailed from 1879 to 1893. [Applause on the Republican side.] And this bill contemplates a return to the practical and satisfactory policy prevailing then so far as it goes.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. The advantage of the first section, as I understand the gentleman, is that it provides for the issuance of 3 per cent bonds——

Mr. DINGLEY. That is one of the advantages.

Mr. MARSH. Let me conclude my question. The sale of 3 per cent bonds to maintain the reserve, instead of the sale of a 4 or 5 per cent bond; and you have told us that it would be a great saving of interest to the people if we could negotiate a 3 per cent bond instead of a 4 per cent bond. Now, that argument is significant if true, but I ask the gentleman from Maine if it is not true that when a 3 per cent bond can be sold at par, a 5 or a 4 per cent bond will sell at a rate of premium that will be less than 3 per cent? In other words, when a bond runs for ten years, is it not worth more than one that runs for five?

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly. What I say is this, that when you offer a bond to the people of the country—to the plain people, who do not stop to make calculations as to premiums—you will find that a large proportion of them would prefer to purchase a 3 per cent bond at par rather than a 4 per cent bond on which they will have to pay a premium. People do not like to pay a premium on their investments. But when they can get a 3 per cent bond at its face, the plain people of this country will take that in preference to paying what would be less than the equivalent for a 4 and 5 per cent bond at a premium. That is the practical working of it.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is true.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why, for what were our thirty-year 4 per cent bonds sold last winter? For 104½, to the syndicate, and at that very date a 3 per cent bond could have been sold to the people of this country, unquestionably, at par. And a sale of 3 per cent fifteen-year bonds at par, in lieu of 4 per cent thirty-year bonds at 104½, would have saved many millions to the Treasury and the people.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Cleveland said not. He said if you would make it a gold bond you could sell it for 3 per cent.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course my friend does not adopt the argument of President Cleveland, I take it. There is not a gentleman acquainted with financial matters in this House who does not know that a 3 per cent bond would have sold at par at that very moment to the people of this country and brought out gold.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. And yet we disposed of thirty-year 4 per cent bonds at 104½. I believe that if we had had the authority, under this act, at that time, to issue a 3 per cent bond, and had offered them to the people of this country, every dollar of it would have been taken at par [applause], and I want that authority to sell bonds to the people of this country to maintain the redemption fund alone and to preserve the credit of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must not be further interrupted in this discussion, because I am trespassing upon the time of other gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker, with this practical question before us, I think we ought to set aside all collateral issues. This has nothing to do with the silver question. It has nothing to do with any of the outside problems which gentlemen have been inclined to discuss. It is a plain, practical question. Is it not better for us to authorize the issue of a 3 per cent bond that may be sold to the people of this country, sold, I have no doubt, to any extent, and that will bring out gold, too, than it is to leave the law as it is and have long-term bonds sold for 4 and 5 per cent interest, as they are certain to be sold unless we authorize bonds at this lower rate of interest?

It seems to me that this is a plain proposition and that we ought to lay aside all prejudice, that we ought to look at this matter as plain, practical men and adopt the plan proposed by this bill, and having, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, taken measures to increase the revenue until it equals expenditures, if the House bill shall become a law, then we can look the people of this country in the face and say that so far as the majority of this House is concerned, we have met the exigencies of the day, the exigencies forced upon this country, in a plain, practical, and patriotic way. And I doubt not, if such a measure as was inaugurated yesterday by the House and as is proposed by the pending bill shall become laws, and the redemption fund shall be constantly maintained, that we shall find the distrust gradually passing away, and when this legislation shall be supplemented by such other legislation as is possible only with a Republican Senate and President we shall find prosperity again coming over this country as it prevailed from 1861 to 1893. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, having so recently addressed the House, I apprehend that my strength will not be adequate to any extended discussion of the bill which is now under consideration. I beg the Chair to admonish me when I have spoken half an hour, if I shall be able to do so, in order that I may then yield the floor to some other gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, our financial situation has given rise to many strictures on the party in power and the present Administration. It ought to be remembered that the present Administration is conducting our financial affairs under laws made by our political adversaries, and the present embarrassment does not arise from any deficiency of funds in the Treasury. The fault lies in vicious currency legislation that comes down to us from a time when my party scarcely had any voice in the framing of the laws.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, would it interrupt the gentleman if I should ask him a question?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would allow me to finish my statement, and I will try then to oblige him, as I have always endeavored to do.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly; I will not seek to interject a question.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I do not deny that at some subsequent stages of our financial system the statesmen of my party have participated more or less in changes of policy, some of which I believe were blunders. But, in my opinion, the fundamental error in our finances was committed in the creation and perpetuation of one vast volume of uncovered paper money, which by legislation has been declared to be a legal tender, and which by the Supreme Court has been validated as constitutional money.

The party that confronts me from the other side has shifted and changed its attitude not only on the tariff, as you saw yesterday—I say it respectfully—it has made the most shameful tergiversations on the subject of our currency. They claim to have conducted the Government through the great civil war; and the energy and endurance and the lavish way in which resources for the success of that great struggle were accumulated will command the admiration of mankind. Following the war that party of the Union, realizing the dangers of an irredeemable currency, passed the resumption act. In the modification of that act in 1868 Democratic representatives participated, I admit. By the action of the Republican party all of our obligations were made payable in coin. At that time we had very little silver, and the little we had was substantially demonetized; in fact, it did not circulate at all. The obligation to pay our debts in coin was in reality an obligation to pay in gold.

On the face of this record for sound money, how does the Republican party stand to-day? Their representatives are paltering with this crisis and cowering with fear. They dare not say a word against this legal-tender paper. They dare not say a word now against the perils of silver payments to our creditors who do not wish silver. How have the mighty fallen!

Mr. Speaker, it is unpleasant to occupy the rôle of a mere critic and censor in this business. We have all made mistakes. But the policy of the House under the rule under which we acted yesterday, and under the rule now pending, leaves us on this side no recourse but strictures. We can not offer amendments. We are not permitted to help you perfect this measure.

I now venture to suggest to my friends on the other side that either they have not been entirely candid or they themselves do not understand this measure. It is said that out of abundant caution a proviso was added to the first section to prevent the retirement of the legal-tender notes. Gentlemen who are the friends of all these notes may find themselves unwittingly entrapped. There is in the first section of the bill a provision to this effect:

And the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof—

That is, of these bond sales—for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose.

And to that is added this morning a proviso, which I will now read:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify the act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes."

Now, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, what is to become of the United States legal-tender notes into which this gold reserve may glide by the process of redemption?

My friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] in the outset of his remarks, which I failed to hear distinctly, seemed to hold that by the operation of this bill the Treasury will have to open two accounts and segregate the proceeds of this redemption into a separate fund and a separate account. I deny it. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, in this bill which would have this effect. It would in no way change the Treasury policy in this respect. The proceeds of these bonds when they reach the Treasury in the form of gold or coin and are converted into legal-tender notes by redemptions will take their place side by side with such legal-tender notes as are already there for any lawful purposes to which the Treasury can devote them. This provision, therefore, is not even a suggestion to the Treasury, as the gentleman has said. "The proceeds thereof" are the gold procured on the bonds, and not the legal-tender notes that may be redeemed with the gold.

But I take a step further. The proviso just quoted, out of abundance of caution, to save the power to reissue legal-tender notes thus accumulated, takes care of that class of these notes which are specified in the act of May 31, 1878, commonly called United States notes, or greenbacks. Let me read it again:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify the act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes."

What, then, becomes of the Sherman notes under the act of 1890, the power to reissue which depends not on the act of 1878, but on the provisions of the Sherman Act of 1890? There is no reference whatever to this latter act. Hence this bill may be construed by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with strict law to authorize the retirement of the Sherman notes.

Mr. QUIGG. May I ask the gentleman whether, if the proviso were not in the bill, it would not have the same effect on the United States notes as if the proviso were there?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, my friend from New York asks me a pertinent question. I am not sure that the proviso was necessary for the professed object. I think that the Treasury without this proviso would have had to reissue all these notes received under the process of redemption under this bill, because both the act of 1878 and the Sherman Act of 1890 would then apply; but when Congress puts in a proviso which saves the reissue of greenbacks and says nothing about the others, the Secretary and the courts would probably enforce the maxim, "The expression of one is the exclusion of the other." Now, what are you gentlemen on the other side going to do with the explanation of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY], who has endeavored so adroitly to avoid the factious differences in his party? The pretext of "abundant caution" in this proviso seems to have been inspired by no caution at all. I endeavored to show yesterday that there was a fatal lapsus or omission in the bill then pending. I show to-day that the gentlemen who are railroading this bill through are doing so regardless of the fatal effect it will have on the Sherman notes. Now, I am not in favor of the Sherman notes. I voted against the act authorizing them. I believe that they contributed greatly to our present difficulties. I have shown you that I deeply regret the perpetuation of the greenback notes; but I am in favor of letting every member of this House and every man throughout the country know what is contained in this crude bill which none of us are permitted to touch.

I may be asked what would be our policy on this side. I have not the power to speak for this side; but I can speak for myself and for a few gentlemen who agree with me in opinion. But first let me say to gentlemen on the other side that when they claim that this measure is a response to the demands of the Treasury and of the Executive they are sailing under false pretenses.

In the first place, the bill does not contain a single provision or a single policy which the Administration or the Treasury recommends. If gentlemen mean to meet the emergency which the Administration depicts in urgent messages, why do they not at least allow some of us the poor privilege of offering such provisions as the Administration desires? Yet we are cut off from that opportunity.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States believe—and there are some of us who believe the same way—that there ought to be provision made for the retirement of all our paper money, so called. Gentlemen on the other side, who have now the laboring oar, felt that way at one time, but now they will not even allow us the opportunity to offer such a provision in response to the demand of a Democratic Administration. It is also a part of the policy recommended by the Administration that these bonds which are to be offered on the market shall be made payable in that sort of coin which it receives for the protection of our legal-tender money; but we are not allowed to offer that amendment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], when that proposition was offered in the last Congress, when we on this side had the opportunity to propose legislation, voted for it. Why is it that the gentleman and those with whom he is now associated do not allow members on his own side an opportunity to vote for such a proposition? The present Speaker himself supported that proposition.

Now, I do not speak for all my political associates. There is an honest difference of opinion between us on this side. So far as I am concerned, I have endeavored, conservatively and with great forbearance, to avoid inflaming that difference of opinion. I do not in any wise impeach the honesty or patriotism of those who differ with me. Far from it. I have deprecated some of their views, but I have done it with the utmost toleration and respect. Speaking only for myself, I believe that this unfortunate difference of opinion in my own party and in the other has done a great deal to prolong and intensify our financial difficulties. Any settlement, sir, on the basis of sound money would have a restorative effect on the country such as mankind has never before witnessed. And, sir, its effects would not be confined to this country alone. It would tend to reassure the tottering credit of our securities in other countries from which they are sent back to us on every impulse of fear and apprehension.

I would to-day be glad to offer a proposition for the retirement of every one of our legal-tender notes of every kind; and I would provide at the same time for such an unfettering and extension of banking facilities and privileges as would restore to the people the power to regulate the volume of their currency and to manage their own fiscal policies and the redemption of their own money.

Not a single one of these bonds, whether exchequer certificates or 3 per cent bonds payable in coin, can be sold at par in any market in this country or anywhere else, in my opinion. Why, sir, on the 26th of the present month United States fours maturing in 1925 were bid for at 116, which, when ciphered out, makes a rate of income of over 3 per cent—three and one-tenth and a fraction. With the market in that condition—with a bond already on the market which is bid for at a rate which would produce a larger rate of interest than the bond you offer, having a much longer time to run, do you suppose you can hold up a 3 per cent bond at par which is itself an addition to the supply of our bonds?

Now, as to these certificates of indebtedness, it is true, as said by the gentleman from Maine, that almost every Government in the world of any dignity and power except our own has authority to supplement deficient revenues by these short bonds or exchequer certificates. And I admit that the granting of such authority to our Government has been recommended by the Treasury Department for years, because it was supposed it would be a useful power in case our revenues should run short. But I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the condition of things which justifies these exchequer bills in other countries does not exist in ours. I believe that you can not dispose of these obligations in a popular way, as this bill presupposes, in amounts of $20 and multiples thereof.

The people of this country have no strong boxes, as have the people in France and elsewhere. They do not keep their money by them. They have no way to secure their valuables. On the contrary, they go to banks, and where savings institutions exist they go to them to deposit their money, and they take a pass book, by which arrangement they are not only saved from any risk as to the keeping of their funds, but their pass book is itself a thing which is equal to the cash whenever they choose to sell it, and on their deposits they receive interest. What need have they for exchequer bills? Will they take them and put them in their hoards at home? Their habits and tastes and previous experience are all against any such arrangement.

In the next place, there is at this time a large surplus in the Treasury available for the current expenses of the Government. I regret to have to say that that large surplus itself is a peril. Let us suppose, if you please, that our friends on the other side should, by some inscrutable providence, realize their hopes next year, and that they should come into power with a large surplus in the Treasury and an added revenue under the bill which they have just passed. I ask (if we may judge by experience), would they not repeat the budget of the Fifty-first Congress and so make exchequer bills necessary? The power to spend, coupled with the power to supply deficiencies with these certificates, would be dangerous in the hands of a party devoted to large expenditures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut). The Chair understood that the gentleman from Georgia desired to be reminded when one-half hour of his time had expired.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I thank the Chair. I will occupy a moment more, and then yield the floor to my friend from Tennessee.

Under our present system, Mr. Speaker, we have what is called the "endless chain" operating in the Treasury. That is a means by which persons who have gold can use it and at the same time recover it at their pleasure. By this arrangement you can eat your cake and keep it, too. [Laughter.] Any man or any bank that has gold by which large store is set can go to the Treasury and offer it in exchange for bonds when these calls are made, and as soon as he receives his bonds, if he is a man of means or a bank with resources, he can return and take out his gold, and thereby have both bonds and gold. [Laughter.]

It is a system, Mr. Speaker, which imperils the entire integrity of our currency system. If it is perpetuated it will continue over our heads the menace under which we have been conducting our business for the past four or five years. I ask gentlemen whether this is not a convenient time to stop this process and to substitute some better system? It has been said that it can be stopped at once by the exercise of the option which the law confers on the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem notes in silver. I candidly admit, Mr. Speaker, that I once had that opinion myself to some extent, and perhaps such a policy, if it had been inaugurated before the fear of silver became general, might long have been safely administered by the Treasury. But further reflection satisfies me that a change from gold to silver in these times of panic and confusion would precipitate a panic which would be almost as bad as if you were to cry "havoc" and let loose the dogs of war. [Applause.]

But, sir, I have already occupied more time than I had intended, and I yield the remainder of my time to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the time allowed me by my friend from Georgia until the members of the Committee on Ways and Means have had an opportunity to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that no other gentleman is ready to proceed now.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like to hear from somebody on the other side before proceeding myself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy the time of the House to-day, but it has been suggested that perhaps it would be better to add my contribution to the discussion at this time.

The advisability of the passage of this bill must be considered in the light of events that have called it into existence. If I believed it to be true, as has been proclaimed in the message of the President of the United States, and as it has been reiterated in the report of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, and as insisted upon in the discussion on yesterday by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], that there is no deficit of a permanent character in the revenues of the Government, and that there is prospectively and beyond all reasonable doubt sufficient revenue going into the Treasury, so that no extraordinary means need be resorted to to protect the integrity of the Treasury, I would not favor the passage of either of the sections of this bill. But when, after an experiment of nearly three years of Democratic administration, we find, in the first place, that there are no words in the English language capable of describing the bad effect of this bad Administration on the affairs of the country; and secondly, that no estimate, or promise, or prophetic utterance of this Administration has had the smallest value from the standpoint of truth,

I am bound to assume that the necessity has arisen which calls for such a measure.

I defy gentlemen on the other side of the House to show me a single utterance, from either the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other of the distinguished leaders of the Democratic party in either branch of Congress that has not utterly failed of fulfillment. So, Mr. Speaker, we are compelled to take things as we find them, and proceed to administer the Government as though there were no Democratic party on the face of the earth. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Georgia, and I may say the Democratic minority on this floor, come here now and criticise the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and yet that same body of men, both in the majority on this floor during the last Congress and in the minority on the floor now, have wholly failed to suggest a single remedy for the troubles and the crushing evils that we are laboring under.

The President of the United States during the last Congress appealed to this House of Representatives to afford him some sort of relief, and his proposition was the issuance of a gold-bearing bond. His proposition was to revolutionize the entire financial system of the Government so far as the borrowing of money was concerned. And yet his party, his Administration, could not muster on this floor one-half of the Democratic vote to stand by him; and while the President was proclaiming and notifying Congress that unless some relief was offered there would be an early suspension of specie payments, this Democratic majority on the floor, with more than one hundred majority, were absolutely unable to offer to the country and to the Administration any sort of relief whatever. And to-day the President has no party behind him or for him in the country.

The differences of opinion were as vital and were as bitterly fought out then as they are being fought out in the country now in the Democratic States, or as they are on this floor here and now. So we have to assume that the Treasury of the United States is without funds.

Gentlemen talk about there being money enough. What do we hear in the organization of our committees as to enforced economy in expenditures? What do we discover, looking back over the history of the appropriations of the last Congress? They were large in the aggregate; but they did not meet the necessities of the people. The demand for the erection of public buildings was almost totally ignored. The improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country was practically abandoned. And when we made appropriations, probably most of them judicious ones, we found the Secretary of the Treasury figuring how not to meet the appropriations of Congress.

The repeal of the McKinley law had deprived the sugar growers of the country of that on which they had a right to depend; and when a Democratic Congress had appropriated upward of $5,000,000 for the relief of those people we suddenly discovered that there had come a pestiferous growth upon the administration of the laws and the Constitution of the United States, and a bureau officer of this Government, actuated possibly by his own self-conceit, actuated possibly by the general demand for the curtailment of appropriations, repealed the law of Congress and refused to execute it. We find stalking through these Departments a total disregard of law. A petty head of a Department, after having been rebuked by the Congress of his own party upon the same question involved later, dared to repeal the act which made appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, dared to violate the law of his country just as viciously as any mob in the whole country ever dared to do it. The troops of the Regular Army were called out to suppress the insurrection of Debs in Chicago; and yet Debs and his followers no more flagrantly violated the law of the country than did this Secretary of Agriculture when he refused to carry into effect the law of Congress, a law against the passage of which he had protested and which was passed over his protest.

So we come to find these things happening, and yet gentlemen tell us that there is money enough. We do not believe it; and, kindly as we would treat them, implicitly as we would rely upon their statements as gentlemen, we can not believe their statements as members of the Democratic party.

What, then, is to be done? Shall we, the party that has always stood by the Treasury, always defended the honor of this Government, always seen to it that the appropriations of Congress should be met, shall we hesitate to provide the necessary revenue?

What is the bill before us? If this was an original proposition to borrow money upon bonds, there might be a great deal of ground for our opposition. A gentleman on the other side yesterday undertook to tell us something about the comparative Administrations of Benjamin Harrison and Grover Cleveland, and he admitted the deficit in this Administration, but undertook to say that the Administration that had preceded this Democratic Administration had also been a failure in its financial operations. That learned gentleman, that able exponent of Democracy, forgot to state that during the Administration of Harrison we paid over $250,000,000 of the bonded national debt, and that up to this time this Administration has sold $162,500,000 of the bonds of the Government, and now comes back for more authority and threatens this country with $200,000,000 more. That is the difference between the two Administrations. One decreases the debt by $250,000,000, the other increases it by nearly a like sum.

But let me go rapidly forward. If this was an original proposition to borrow money, it would not be here in a Republican House of Representatives. We have not had to borrow money. It is something new to us. We have been enabled to run this Government without any oppression upon the people, and constantly pay the national debt. At the close of the war the bonded debt of the country was nearly $3,000,000,000, and when we turned it over to Mr. Cleveland it was only about $700,000,000. During his Administration he has succeeded in adding to the national debt over $250,000,000, and the Lord only knows in what shape it will be turned over to us again. It is new business for the Republican party to borrow money for any other purpose than to protect and make possible specie payments by the Treasury Department.

And now what is happening? We have a law in Congress that no man proposes to repeal. Gentlemen on the other side have not offered any proposition, either in this Congress or in any other that I know anything about to repeal the act of 1875, called the resumption act. That act authorized the President of the United States to borrow money for resumption purposes only, and that law has never been violated by a Republican President. Whether that law has been violated by a Democratic President I leave to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to discuss, if he sees fit to do it. That law authorized the President to borrow money upon bonds at 4 and 5 per cent interest. If at 4 per cent, he might make the bonds for thirty years; if at 5 per cent, for a lesser term; but he could borrow money upon no other bonds. And so stands the law of this country to-day.

So, Mr. Cleveland's proposition to Congress having failed in the last session, he proceeded to borrow under that law. I do not care to stop now and discuss the results of that loan. It was the most unfortunate blot upon the record of American financiering—done in a night; done in a secret chamber somewhere; done without the knowledge of Congress; done without the knowledge of the people; done in the interest of a speedy relief of the Treasury, and it cost the Treasury not less than $10,000,000, that went into the hands of men who ought not to have had a dollar for all they did, above a reasonable commission—in striking contrast with the record of the Republican administration in 1878.

Now, what do we say by this bill? We say that if this thing is to go on we will here and now divide this scheme of finance. One shall be a scheme for the redemption of outstanding notes of the Government. The money raised for resumption purposes shall be kept separate and apart from the ordinary expenses of the Government. We will not have the statutes and laws of the country trampled under foot in spirit if not in letter by the Treasury Department any more. We will not have money borrowed for redemption purposes used in the current expenses of the Government. So we say that in the event the Treasury of the United States shall become unable to pay the current appropriations of Congress, then and in that case the 3 per cent certificates of indebtedness may be issued by the Treasury Department, and that only in case of emergency; that bonds shall not be issued for current expenditures without necessity, but only to relieve the Treasury from the bungling of incompetent administration and from the violation of the spirit if not the letter of the law of 1875.

Then we say that in order to protect the gold reserve, which all concur is a necessary adjunct to a sound financial system, we will authorize the President to change the mode of operation under the law of 1875, and that he may sell 3 per cent bonds instead of 4 per cent bonds. He may make them payable in fifteen years instead of thirty years, and redeemable after five years if the Government shall be able to do it, and I think it will. I think the signs of the times all indicate that the old party that knows how to pay the national debt is coming back into power, and it will pay the national debt again and give the Democracy of some future generation, if again it comes into power, an opportunity to pile it up, as it has always done. [Laughter.]

Then we say just this much further: You shall make these bonds payable in fifteen years; you shall make them redeemable in five; and then you shall never again—never again—enter into a financial conspiracy to harm the people of the United States by any more secret syndicate contracts. Not only shall you sell this new 3 per cent loan, if necessary, so that all the people of the country shall know what is going on—shall have an opportunity to take them, have an opportunity to bid for them—but under that changed law of 1875 we say, even if you resort to that law and want to sell a 4 per cent or a 5 per cent bond, you shall do that by public outcry, as it were, through the Treasury and every depository of the Government throughout the country. That is all there is in this proposition. It is not to enlarge the power to issue bonds, except when the Treasury is in default for money to pay its obligations. If the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] be a true one, if he is a correct prophet, and if he rightly foretells the future, there never will be one of these certificates issued in the country. I think if there is one of them issued it will be during the term of Mr. Cleveland or very soon thereafter, for the Republican party does not issue certificates of indebtedness—they pay cash as they go along. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Why, my countrymen, what is there here that any man shall object to on the score that he is not willing to issue any more bonds? You do not propose to repeal the act of 1875? You do not propose to take away the barrier that all this time has stood between the greenback dollar and depreciation for want of a redeemer? Surely not. Then what objection is there in changing the law in the interest of a lower rate of interest and in the interest of a more public if not a more honest administration of the Treasury Department?

So, Mr. Speaker, waiving no jot or tittle of my opposition to the general idea of increasing the public debt of the country, I am willing to vote for this measure as a measure of relief to the Treasury Department, and I am willing to do it even though it be to rescue a Democratic Administration from bankruptcy and disgrace. Behind the occupation of the public places by the Democratic party there stands my country; behind the Administration, the most unutterable in its total failure of perfection of any Administration that this country ever had; behind it all, and underneath it, is my country, a country which the Republican party has saved in war and saved in peace; a country that will, in the hands of the Republican party, again rise from the ashes of Democracy and go forward to ultimate glory and perfection. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to recite to the House a very few historical facts. Under the act of 1878, known as the Bland-Allison Act, $383,000,000 silver dollars were coined and placed in circulation, every one of which is to-day a part of our currency. On the 14th of July, 1890, the Congress of the United States passed what is known as the Sherman law, which required the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase monthly 4,500,000 ounces of fine silver. That amounted to 54,000,000 ounces every year, or 540,000,000 ounces every ten years. This extraordinary legislation, legislation enacted by the Republican party and approved by a Republican President, was the beginning of the distress which now fills our country.

No wonder that such legislation should have alarmed the commercial world. You can trace financial disaster from that hour, just as you can trace the track of a cyclone. The customs receipts plainly indicate the progress of the disaster. In the month of June, 1890, the month preceding the enactment of that law, 94.6 per cent of all the revenues of the Government received at the custom-house in New York—and that is where the great bulk of our revenues from importation is collected—94.6 of all the revenues there received, I say, was paid in gold. Gold then was freely in circulation. It was upon the counter of every bank, and importers preferred paying gold to any other currency in discharge of customs dues. Ninety-four and six-tenths per cent of the customs revenues received at the New York custom-house was paid in gold in that month of June, 1890, and that was about the rate for other months preceding.

Passing on, now, one year, we find that in the month of June, 1891, only 12½ per cent of the customs dues were paid in gold, showing that the want of confidence in our financial system had become fixed in the mind of the commercial world. The returns for June, 1892, show that of the entire revenue collected at the custom-house at New York only 8.3 per cent was paid in gold, showing that there had been an increase in the want of confidence between June, 1891, and June, 1892. Coming down another year, the record shows that for the month of June, 1893, not one cent, not the millionth part of a cent of the revenues collected at the port of New York were paid in gold. Gold ceased to flow into the Treasury. The gold currency of the United States was then hoarded.

The country was in the throes of a great panic, and our extreme distress was upon us. Then, in the month of October, 1893, Congress repealed the Sherman law, and what was the result? In the month of October, 1893, 37.6 per cent of the customs dues were paid in gold. Then it was that a renewed attack was made upon the reserve, growing out of a further want of confidence in our currency, and, as I believe, largely on account of the action of the Fifty-third Congress. So it happened that in the month of October, 1894, again not one dollar of gold entered the Treasury of the United States through our custom-houses. Again—and this is the last report which is accessible to me—in the month of September, 1895, not one dollar of gold came into the Treasury through the custom-house at New York.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a strange, an extraordinary condition of affairs. It shows that the commercial world has no confidence in our financial system, that confidence has not been restored, and that to-day there is still a want of confidence in the currency of our country. Is that very remarkable, sir, when we have in circulation 423,000,000 of silver dollars, the metallic value of which is about 50 cents on the dollar, and about $500,000,000 of legal-tender paper money outstanding against a reserve of less than $100,000,000 in gold? Is it at all remarkable that there should be a want of confidence when such a condition of affairs exists?

Mr. Speaker, I have reached the conclusion, which is firmly fixed in my mind, that the great and paramount duty of Congress is to restore confidence in the currency of our country. A simple resolution passed by Congress that it is the purpose and policy of this great Republic to maintain inviolate its standard of value would be worth a great deal more to the American people and to the prosperity of the country than a bond issue. What the American people demand, what the commercial world needs, is a declaration of that kind. The thing that stands in the way of our prosperity and of the entire recuperation of the business of the country is the absence of an effort to remove all doubt from the mind of the commercial world and from the minds of our own people as to the absolute stability and safety of our currency, the absolute fixedness and certainty of our standard of value.

In 1875, when the act was passed for the issuing of our coin bonds, there was not a million silver dollars in circulation, and their coinage was suspended. To-day, as I have already said, we have $423,000,000 of them and five hundred millions of uncovered paper money, making over $900,000,000 in circulation, all dependent upon a low Treasury reserve. And that, too, with our people divided in opinion on the question. I unite with my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] in saying that I have no word of censure for gentlemen who do not agree with me. I concede to gentlemen who differ with me honesty of opinion, but I do invite investigation and honest discussion in respect to the existing condition of affairs and the causes of it. What is the apprehension of our own people? What is the apprehension of the commercial world in respect to our financial condition? It is that it may at any time be precipitated to a silver basis. A very large proportion of the membership of the two great political parties is to-day advocating free coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1. Those gentlemen with whom I agree on that subject, no matter of what political party they may be, are absolutely of the opinion that free coinage would result in silver monometallism in the United States.

This being the state of mind of the country, this being the sentiment of the commercial world in respect to our currency, are we discharging our duty to the American people when we propose to pass such a law as this? The proposition is to sell a coin bond. Suppose that our free-silver friends should succeed two years hence in passing an act for the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, what would be the result? These bonds would be payable in coin and could be discharged in silver dollars worth much less than 100 cents on the dollar compared with our present currency. Now, this is the apprehension in the minds of people at home and abroad. What is the purpose of this bill? It is to sell bonds for gold to replenish the gold reserve. No member who joined in reporting this bill has ever conceived it possible that these bonds would be sold for anything else than gold; yet the bill provides that they shall be redeemed in coin—that is, in either gold or silver; and if the country should come to a silver basis they could be discharged in depreciated money. I appeal to the House whether this meets the wants of the country. Does this answer to the situation of the hour?

I am satisfied that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], does not contemplate anything else than that these bonds shall be sold for gold and that they shall be paid in gold. If that is true, why not say so upon the face of the bonds? There is not a member in this House, there is not a citizen in the land, who would not regard it as honorable and right to return that which he had borrowed. The authors of this bill know that gold is required to maintain the gold reserve. The object of this bill is to provide gold for that purpose. Yet these bonds will go out into the markets of the world with the stipulation upon their face that they can be discharged in any kind of coin which happens to be standard money when the bonds fall due. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this does not meet the exigencies of the situation. It may meet the exigencies of the political situation, it may meet the exigencies of the Republican party, but it does not meet the requirements of the country; it does not meet the requirements of commerce; it does not restore that confidence which the American people so much desire.

These bonds are redeemable after five years. They are required to be sold in this country to the highest bidder; and all that the bidder need do is to reach his hand into the Treasury reserve, take out the gold, buy the bonds, and the Treasury is where it began. No opportunity is given to strengthen the gold currency of the United States. No opportunity is given to negotiate for gold abroad. The powers which the Secretary of the Treasury now has under existing law are taken from him by this bill.

So, Mr. Speaker, I can come to no other conclusion from my standpoint than that this bill is a miserable makeshift. The President has asked Congress for bread for the people and the Republican party has given him a stone. It is no improvement on existing conditions. Existing conditions are preferable to the conditions that will occur under this legislation.

I can not for one give this bill my support. If its framers would simply deal with this proposition candidly, and say that the Government would pay that which it borrowed; if they would say what I believe they really mean—that it is their purpose and the purpose of the Congress of the United States to maintain inviolate the parity of all our money and to maintain at all hazards the fixedness and stability of our standard of value—I would vote for this bill, come from what quarter it might.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party has disappointed the country. The Republican party has turned the head of its columns toward Sedan. The American people will not be satisfied with this proposed legislation. I know that men who agree with me are perhaps in a minority on this side of the House. I know that they are in a minority of a minority in the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; yet I verily believe that the Executive who has appealed to this Congress to maintain the public credit and the national honor represents more completely the better thought of the country and the American people than any man living to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I take consolation in standing with those whom I believe to be right. The Republican party is making this great blunder; it is not responding to the necessities of the country. There will be a revival of democracy in these United States. The spirit of Andrew Jackson, who restored the gold currency to this country in 1834, still walks the earth to inspire patriotic men in this emergency. You may rely upon it that ultimately the country will come to the position that it is the duty of the American people and that it is absolutely necessary to their welfare and prosperity to maintain inviolate their standard of value.

I am not here, and never have been, to advocate striking down a silver circulation. There is not to-day a gold country in the world that does not largely use silver in its circulation. There is not a silver country in the world that uses gold at all. I wish, so far as I am concerned—and that is the opinion of those with whom I agree—that we may have the very largest silver circulation consistent with the unquestioned maintenance of our standard of value. This is our position, and, in my humble judgment, this will be the position of the Democracy in 1896. And when that revival comes, when there is recurrence to the time-honored principles taught by Jackson and Benton and Calhoun in 1834, when the gold currency was restored to the country, and again proclaimed in Congress in 1853, when it was made secure, the Democratic party will regain and hold the confidence of the American people, for it will stand for the liberty of the citizen, the liberty of the State, the liberty of commerce, honest government and sound money, the prosperity of the people, and the triumph of constitutional government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Before the gentleman from Virginia proceeds I desire to return the time which I have remaining to my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS). In whose time has the gentleman spoken?

Mr. PATTERSON. In the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has exhausted the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had ten minutes accorded me by the Chair, which I have not exhausted, and I desire to yield that time to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] for yielding me time to address this House upon the pending proposition.

The country has anxiously awaited the assembling of this Congress to ascertain what were the policies of the Republican party in dealing with the great difficulties which to-day confront us—what measures this party would offer to relieve the present distress.

Last Monday the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Republican leader of this House, stated that yesterday and to-day his party would present measures which they conceived would relieve the country and answer its present wants.

Two bills have been presented by this party for this purpose. You have, by the adoption of the rule of yesterday and to-day, deprived the House of all right to offer or vote upon any amendments to these propositions. This House is compelled to either adopt or reject them.

Before proceeding to a discussion of these measures, I desire to enter my protest against any such method of procedure. It is the first time since the organization of this House that measures of such magnitude as these of to-day and yesterday have been presented and the House deprived of all right of amendment. It is depriving this House of its most sacred right, the right to perfect legislation in accordance with its ideas and convictions. Deprived of this right, this House ceases to be a representative or a deliberative body.

If I mistake not, when the great Napoleon, as first consul, reorganized the Government of France he created a legislative body of 500, whose duties were confined to the consideration of such measures as he presented to them, and these measures could only be accepted or rejected, they could not be amended. They were compelled to partake of the viands spread before them or starve. They had no privilege of selection.

The Speaker of this House, the first consul of the Republican party, has transformed this House into a pretended legislative body the very counterpart of the one organized by the French despot to serve his ambitious purposes. We can only consider such measures as the Committee on Rules, of which he is chairman, reports, and the measure thus reported must be either accepted or rejected, the House can not amend them. The pretended legislative body of France was only a reflex of the imperial will of the first consul. This House by this tyrannical method becomes only a reflex of the imperial will of the Speaker. We can only get legislation fashioned by his hand. This House ceases to represent the country, but becomes only an instrument to give approval to the designs of the Speaker. It destroys the freedom of this assembly, which should be the model representative body of the world. You Republicans, by adopting these rules, say you owe your allegiance to the Speaker. I recognize my allegiance alone to my constituency. As you Republicans have nearly unanimously voted for these rules, which prevent all amendment, I presume you consider that these measures are perfection, so far as Republican thought and policy can make them. They contain all the country may expect from you. They embody all the hopes and promises of your party. It is your method of dealing with the present difficulties. Your bill passed yesterday did not receive a Democratic vote. The present one will not receive any Democratic support.

I shall state frankly and candidly my objections to your bills. I shall discuss them fully so that this House and the country may understand your designs and purposes.

If your measures become law, instead of lessening they will greatly aggravate the present difficulties.

I announce, and it can not be successfully contradicted upon this floor, that the design and the ultimate effect of your measures will be to take out of circulation and retire the legal-tender Treasury notes and greenbacks, amounting to $500,000,000, about one-third of the entire money of the country, without substituting anything in their place.

Your bills accomplish this in two ways: One by collecting a large surplus in the Treasury by taxation; and the other by providing for the sale of bonds to add to this surplus, until you have collected in the Treasury and withdrawn from circulation all the notes redeemable in coin.

Yesterday, under a pretense of a deficiency in the revenue, you passed a bill which you admit will collect in taxes from the people $40,000,000 a year. You provide that it shall continue in force until the 1st of August, 1898. Thus, under this bill, by your own admission, you will collect in money and put in the Treasury about $105,000,000.

On the 1st of December last the report of the Secretary of the Treasury showed that there was in the Treasury $177,406,386.62. He estimates that next year there would be, under the present law, a deficiency of $17,000,000 and the succeeding year a surplus of $7,000,000. Thus, under your bill of yesterday, you make the Government stretch forth its hand by taxation and collect from the already overtaxed and impoverished people $175,000,000 to lock up in the Treasury. But, as this would still leave out in circulation about $325,000,000 of coin notes, you come to-day and supplement your bill of yesterday by providing for the sale of bonds to get gold enough to redeem this amount of coin notes, which, when redeemed, will be kept in the Treasury and out of circulation. With a surplus of revenue over expenses, as you provide, there is no way of getting this amount of money in circulation again. Your bill does not provide for cancellation, but as this vast amount will be locked up in the Treasury, out of circulation so far as the people and business are concerned, it will be the same thing, equally as ruinous and disastrous. Thus this legislation means the destruction, so far as the people are concerned, of about $500,000,000 of the present currency without substituting anything in its place. I believe that this would result in untold disasters to the vast majority of the people. I believe it would precipitate a panic more frightful than any we have yet witnessed. I believe it would reduce the supply of currency so as to paralyze all business and manufacturing enterprises. I believe it would still further depress the prices of all products and property. I believe it would add double burdens on the debtors and benefit only our foreign creditors and a few money lenders and speculators in this country. [Applause.]

I am not one of those who believe in contracted currency. I am not one who believes that we have at present a redundant currency. I think we should increase instead of decrease our currency. Those who advocate the gold standard and claim that we have too much currency at present are mistaken and base their conclusions on the per capita theory of money. They claim that we have more money per capita now than we ever had before, but there is no bigger humbug in the world than the theory that money should be in proportion to the population. We do not trade in people. Men are not bought and sold. We trade in property. As money is a standard of value and a medium of exchange, it should bear a proportion to the property and business of the country. The best measure of the business of a country is the value of its property.

Let us ascertain what was the relation between property and money under normal and natural conditions. The census of 1860 is the last census by which we can ascertain this. In 1860 we had the free coinage of both gold and silver. In 1870 we were on a greenback basis and had neither gold nor silver. In 1880 and 1890 we had demonetized silver. Thus the last census which can give us the proper relation, under normal and natural conditions, between property and money is the census of 1860.

In 1860 our property amounted to $16,159,616,068, and our circulation to $435,407,252. Thus we then had $1 for every $37 worth of property. In 1890 we had $65,037,091,197 of property and only $1,429,251,270 of currency. About the same proportion exists to-day. Thus at present we have only $1 for every $45 worth of property.

If we should make our currency bear the same proportion to property that it did in 1860, instead of decreasing our currency by retiring the greenbacks and other coin notes, we would have to increase it about 21½ per cent, or about $305,000,000. If we retired the greenbacks and coin notes, we would have only $1 to every $69 worth of property.

Now, the force of a dollar is limited. It can only give value to a certain amount of property and answer certain demands. Unless our currency is increased, the natural results will be that $45 worth of property will be reduced in value until it is only worth $37. The shrinkage in value of produce and property of all kinds shows that this inexorable law is working and depressing prices. Unless we reform our financial system, there will be a further and greater fall in prices.

To retire $500,000,000 of the currency, as here proposed, would produce a fall in prices frightful to contemplate. Values of all kinds of property would be swept away so surely and quickly that it would be difficult to determine who was solvent. The circulation in this country has been greatly exaggerated. On November 1 the Secretary of the Treasury estimated that the entire circulation amounted to $1,598,859,316. He fails to deduct from this the amounts held by the banks as a reserve.

On the 28th of September, 1895, all banks in the United States had in their vaults, in cash, $568,783,783.61. Their deposits on that day amounted to $4,886,899,331.28. Thus the banks owed on demand eight times more than they had in their vaults. Thus they had loaned far below the safety limit and would be compelled to keep that amount locked up in their vaults out of circulation. Deducting this from the amount given by the Secretary of the Treasury, it would leave about $1,030,000,000 in circulation.

Now, the census of 1890 shows that the annual taxes collected in the United States for State, city, county, and Federal purposes amounted to $1,040,473,013. Thus we have the amazing fact that the taxes collected in the United States each year are about $10,000,000 in excess of the real money in circulation. We are confronted with the fact that each year every dollar of money in circulation must pass through either the Federal, State, city, or county treasuries before it gets out again into circulation.

Retire the greenbacks and coin notes, as here proposed, and the taxes of the country each year will be double the actual circulation. The census of 1890 shows that the aggregate minimum indebtedness of the United States amounts to $20,227,170,546. Thus the indebtedness is twenty times in excess of the real circulation. Retire the greenbacks and coin notes and it will be forty times in excess of it. The annual interest charge in the United States, by the census of 1890, amounts to $1,166,101,303. Thus, at present, the annual interest charge of this country is about $130,000,000 in excess of the real circulation. Retire the greenbacks and coin notes and it will be more than double.

Thus, if this legislation proposed here to-day by the Republican party prevails the taxes and interest paid each year by the people will be four times more than the real circulation among them.

This would mean such a frightful sacrifice of property as in many cases would amount almost to confiscation.

A comparison of the censuses of 1870 and of 1890 will exhibit the great loss sustained by the farmer on account of a contracted currency and the partial introduction here of the gold standard. I will only make the comparison in my own State, yet those of nearly every other State are similar.

In 1870 the capital invested in farming in Virginia amounted to $246,132,550, and the value of the productions were $51,774,801. In 1890 the capital invested in farming in Virginia amounted to $294,488,569, and the value of the products to only $42,244,458. Thus in 1890 the farmers had invested in farming $48,356,019 more than in 1870, yet received $9,530,343 less for their products. In other words, the farmers, with an investment of 19 per cent more of capital, made 24 per cent less in profits in 1890 than in 1870. In these dry figures can be read the distress, the poverty, and the wretchedness that has overtaken the farmer. They portray more vividly than language how each year his profits have disappeared in falling prices until he is confronted with a load of indebtedness which he is powerless to remove.

My vision stretches far beyond these dry figures of the census and I see the actualities of life which they indicate. In the aggregate of taxes in excess of money I see the difficulties of the people in meeting taxation. I see a great sacrifice of property or else the tax collector's sale. In the vast pile of indebtedness, standing out on the census report like some large mountain peak, I see an accumulated mass of woe and wretchedness. I see mortgaged homes, the occupants expecting each day to be turned adrift, without house or shelter. I see large business houses, profitable to the country, overshadowed with debt and tottering on the verge of ruin. I see, as the collection of this vast indebtedness proceeds, further fall in the prices of all property, and that men who think themselves rich, in disappearing values, will find themselves bankrupt. [Applause.]

These conditions exist to-day. Retire the greenbacks and the coin notes without substituting anything in their place, as is here proposed, and all these evils will be doubly intensified.

The currency of a country must bear a proper proportion to its property, taxes, indebtedness, and business. Unless it does, low prices, bankruptcy, and general paralysis of business must follow.

The trouble with us to-day is that our currency is too small in comparison with our property, business, taxes, and debts. When measured by these it is smaller to-day than ever before known in our history. If the greenbacks and Treasury notes are retired, you will next witness an assault upon the standard silver dollars in our circulation, amounting to nearly $450,000,000. The same powers to-day seeking to destroy the greenbacks and Treasury notes have declared war upon these. No currency has their approval except gold and national-bank notes redeemable in gold. When they have destroyed the Treasury notes and greenbacks and silver, as is now contemplated, there will remain nothing except gold to redeem the national-bank notes in. The national banks can never bring any relief to the South and West, for every bank organized there will decrease instead of increasing the currency.

If permission were given the banks, as suggested, to issue notes up to the face value of the bonds, it would result in putting a still higher premium on United States bonds. A bank organized in the South or West would have to send $120,000 North to purchase bonds and would then only receive $100,000 back in currency. Thus there would be $20,000 less in money in circulation after than before the bank was organized. There is no relief in this for us, yet this is all the Republican party has to offer. It has ever stubbornly and persistently refused to extend any financial relief to the great South and West. The Republican party demonetized silver in 1873, when it was at a premium, without cause and without excuse. In 1875 it passed the resumption act, which provided for retiring and destroying the greenbacks. In 1890, when it again came into power, it repealed the Bland-Allison Act, passed by a Democratic Congress, which was coining 2,000,000 silver dollars per month and put in its place the Sherman Act, which bought silver and paid for it with gold without coining the silver. Last session of Congress the Republican party voted almost solidly against coining the $200,000,000 of silver bullion in the Treasury. To-day you have adopted a rule which prohibits us from offering as an amendment to your bill a proposition to coin this silver bullion in the Treasury. The passage of this would give all the relief claimed as necessary by you. It would coin $55,000,000 of silver seigniorage, which would more than supply any imaginary deficiency of revenue. The currency would be increased to that amount.

Out of the other silver bullion could be coined enough to retire all the Sherman coin notes which daily raid the Treasury for gold. This would reduce the coin notes raiding the Treasury to such an extent as to relieve it of all difficulties. Thus by this method the present troubles could be settled safely, and by an expansion instead of a contraction of the currency. But you Republicans are bitterly opposed to this. The Republican party in both the House and the Senate has ever opposed the free coinage of silver. It was a Democratic House of Representatives that passed the law in 1878 prohibiting the cancellation of the greenbacks and requiring their reissuance, thus saving $346,000,000 in currency to the people. It was a Democratic House of Representatives that passed the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 and gave the people over 400,000,000 standard silver dollars. When the effort was made in the last Democratic Congress to retire $500,000,000 of greenbacks and Treasury notes, it was defeated by a large majority, and this money was preserved to the people. This bill, destroying this vast amount of money, to-morrow will pass this House by a large majority. The first act of legislation of the Republican party is destructive of the best interest of the people.

You Republicans have utterly failed to respond to the wishes and desires of the country. You have turned a deaf ear to everybody except the greedy and avaricious bondholders and money lenders. The country in the next election will hold you to a strict accountability. Many who have hitherto aided you with their suffrages will desert you, as your intention is now manifest to put this country upon a contracted gold basis. Your advent to power in all the departments of the Government will mark the complete establishment here of the gold standard.

The country now recognizes that the only hope for an enlarged currency, for the creation of a local currency to supplement the national currency, for a cessation of tariff agitation, for the remonetization of silver, is with the Democratic party. This party alone has saved them their present currency against your destructive hands. But for the patriotic efforts and success of the Democratic party we would have no greenbacks, no standard silver dollars to-day. The country now recognizes that, instead of expecting an increase of currency from the Republican party, it must save its present currency from the destroying efforts of this party. We are prepared for the conflict. The people of this country are determined to have financial relief, and they will bury with their condemnation this party and these men who, after being commissioned to come here, falsify their pledges and instead of being an aid are great hindrances in the consummation of this end. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. SWANSON. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. HARDY. I desire to ask if you have read the bill before the House, and if it does not state emphatically that this bill is not to retire the greenbacks?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes, it does state that; but I would like the gentleman to tell me how he is going to get the greenbacks out in circulation again if they are not used to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. HARDY. We will do it as we have done before, by taking them and sending them out again——

Mr. LACEY. By buying Democratic bonds.

Mr. SWANSON. Is that your proposition? Then your proposition is to sell bonds on Monday and pay a premium for them on Tuesday. That is pretty financiering.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman stated in his opening remarks that there was a surplus in the Treasury to-day of $70,000,000, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY. I will ask the gentleman if that surplus is a part of the $182,000,000 that Mr. Cleveland has borrowed?

Mr. SWANSON. It is, and I will say to the gentleman if he had listened to my statement he would have learned there would have been $182,000,000 locked up in the Treasury, out of circulation to-day, but for the necessity of issuing it to meet current expenses.

Mr. HARDY. If it had not been for the Democrats there would not have been any deficit. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SWANSON. I will tell you the difference between you and Mr. Cleveland. You come here by taxation, in addition to a sale of bonds, and try to retire all the greenbacks, while Mr. Cleveland wishes to do so only by the sale of bonds.

Mr. HARDY. No, sir; I came here by votes.

Mr. SWANSON. I suppose that is what you came by.

Mr. HARDY. There were 38,000 votes polled in my district. How many did you get in your district?

Mr. SWANSON. I got over 10,000 and beat my opponent by over 2,000.

Mr. HARDY. How many votes were cast in your district?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know, sir. I think there must have been——

Mr. HARDY. There were more votes cast in three districts in my State than in all Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the gentleman on his shrewdness in talking about the number of votes cast in his district instead of about the question before the House.

I will tell you gentlemen on the other side the difference between your plan and the President's. You say: "We will get all the chickens in a coop, but we will not clip off their heads;" the President wants to get them in the coop and clip of their heads. [Laughter. Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, as long as the present Administration is in power it seems that we must be constantly confronted with the question of issuing bonds. It is not a pleasant thing to contemplate. In former days the Republican party provided for the issuance of bonds to maintain the necessary reserve for the redemption of our Treasury notes.

No one then thought that the funds thus provided for would be used for anything except the keeping up of the reserve, and as long as the revenues of the Government equaled or exceeded its current expenditures there was no reason for any apprehension as to the misuse of the law of 1875. But now dear-bought experience has taught us that some more convenient form of bonds should be provided for, and at the same time the Government should be restricted in the sale of all bonds, so that private and scandalous contracts may not again startle the country.

I would be glad to be able to vote for the repeal of all laws authorizing the issuance of Government bonds, and I would do so if it were not evident that from time to time the issuance of such bonds may become necessary.

When under Mr. Cleveland's former Administration, under the tariff laws then in force, bonds were called in and paid off, and when during Mr. Harrison's term an immense amount of the national debt was paid off and extinguished, we gave but little thought to the question of what kind of interest-bearing obligations we should issue in the future.

But under the mismanagement of the present Administration, with the new revenue law in full force, it is plainly evident that more money may be needed in the future from the same source.

To-day the balance of cash in the Treasury is $175,452,183.80, including the shattered remains of the gold reserve. Mr. Cleveland has already issued $162,400,000 of bonds, which realized about $178,000,000. If this money had not been borrowed, instead of having a balance of cash in the Treasury and a part of the reserve, the whole of the reserve would have been gone, the cash balance would all have disappeared, and there would have been $3,000,000 of unpaid warrants. In fact, every pretext has been made use of to stand off and delay claims against the Government, or the showing would be even worse than this.

The sugar bounty of $5,000,000 has been tied up by the ruling of Comptroller Bowler, and by the delay in the payment of the lawful claims against the Government the balance in the Treasury is made to appear larger than it would have been had we paid current bills as our national honor requires.

Notwithstanding the tender of relief by a revenue bill from this House, it is evident that before relief could come from that quarter another bond issue is exceedingly probable under existing law. The Republican party is in no wise responsible for this condition of things, but as we are now in power in this body, it becomes our duty to make such improvements in the system of bonds that a bond-issuing Administration may do as little harm as possible.

The proposed bill provides two additional kinds of bonds at lower rates of interest than those provided for by the existing law; one kind to replace any loss in the coin reserve, and the other to supply any deficiencies in the current revenues.

And in addition to these provisions the Secretary of the Treasury is forbidden to sell any bonds under the present bill or under the resumption act of 1875 except at public offers.

The bill will give a more convenient and cheaper form of bonds than those provided for under the act of 1875, and will prevent any more private bond sales. If the tariff bill which we have just passed should become a law, we may have good reason to believe that not many bonds will become necessary hereafter. But in the impending probability of some further issues by Mr. Cleveland it is necessary that some such measure as the one now before the House should be enacted.

The Republicans are not favorable to bond issues. Such issues are a sign of financial disease. When an individual's expenses exceed his income he issues his promissory notes for the deficiency. To maintain his credit he must increase his income or decrease his expenditures or reform his financial condition in both directions.

Nations are amenable to the same laws. With un-American legislation we are met with an adverse balance of trade by the purchase of foreign goods in excess of our exports, and by an inadequate tariff the Treasury is met with a monthly deficit in the revenues.

Under this condition bonds will be necessary from time to time until by Republican policy the country can again resume its former prosperity.

However averse we may be to bond issues we must recognize the fact that under this Administration they will be a necessity. We may not like the remedy, but disease can not be abolished by the destruction of all medicine.

The proposed bill puts this bond-issuing Administration under bonds to the public. It forbids the secret and devious methods of the last bond sale.

If this bill should fail because of the votes of some of our Republican friends the result will be that the President will call in his favored syndicate for another inroad upon the Treasury. His remedy is to apply the leech.

When you go before the people in the next campaign and criticise the next bond issue your constituents will ask you if a bill was not introduced to change this method of selling bonds and if you did not vote against it.

It is argued by our Democratic opponents that the President does not want this bill to pass. This is a most excellent reason why we should vote for it.

Gentlemen upon the other side seem to be very much divided upon this question, and they also seem to be in great apprehension of a surplus in the Treasury. My friend from Virginia who has just taken his seat [Mr. SWANSON] has been questioning us as to what we will do if a surplus arises from the revenue bill which was passed on yesterday, and from the redemption of the greenbacks and their accumulation in the Treasury. The answer is very simple. We have never had any difficulty with a surplus. We bought bonds from time to time, as a surplus accumulated in the Treasury, and thus kept the money out among the people. But the question before us now is not as to whether bonds shall be issued, but as to the character of the bonds that the Treasury may issue under the exigencies of the circumstances that surround us. I am not one of those Republicans who have been inclined to criticise Mr. Cleveland merely for the issuance of bonds. I have never blamed him for the mere fact of the issuance of any bonds, but I have been inclined to criticise him and his party for having enacted legislation which rendered the issuance of bonds necessary, and also for the manner in which those bonds were issued. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us, if it had no other merit, ought to pass a Republican Congress because of the provision which I will read, and to which I will briefly ask the attention of the House:

Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875, he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

No such course was adopted when the last issue of bonds was made. Those bonds were sold secretly. A thing was done in the negotiation of those bonds that ought to be prohibited by law. Our Democratic predecessors in the Fifty-third Congress were invited, by a bill framed by the present Speaker of this House, to provide that the shady sort of transaction which had already taken place should not be repeated, but they refused to do so.

This House will not do its duty if it does not enact legislation substantially embracing the provision which I have just read. Bonds were issued by the Administration under a secret contract at 104½, and they were a few days after put up and sold at public sale to bidders who were required to take them at 113½. Gentlemen will remember that the President told us in his message that those bonds would not bring more than $104½ under the existing condition of the market unless we would strike out the word "coin" and insert "gold." Congress refused to do that, and the bonds were issued with the word "coin" instead of the word "gold." They were offered at public sale at 113½, and the whole amount of those bonds was subscribed twenty times over in twenty minutes, showing that the public put no such low estimate upon the nation's credit as Mr. Cleveland and his favored syndicate pretended to.

On the 1st day of last October the syndicate published their report, intended to defend the Administration. They claimed that they had made only about $4,000,000 upon the transaction, but gentlemen will remember how that computation was made. This estimate was made by figuring the difference between 104½ and 113½, and by deducting certain expenses which they claimed to have incurred in covering gold into the Treasury. But in that report the syndicate neglected one very important item. That was the fact that in the distribution of the bids they gave the individual members of the syndicate the preference to take all those bonds at 113½, so that when the bonds were afterwards sold to the public at 121½, and even as high as 122, the individual members of the syndicate got the benefit of the rise, so that the real amount of their profit would run up to ten or twelve million dollars, instead of four millions, as they reported it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is time that we should call a halt upon transactions like that. We read in the morning papers of the last day or two that Mr. Stetson, a former law partner of the President, and Mr. Morgan, the chief of the syndicate, have been paying a portentous visit to the capital of the United States, and that a bond issue is imminent. The visit of these gentlemen to this city bodes no good to the nation. We ought to provide as speedily as possible that no other bond issue shall be made on any such basis as that which disgraced the administration of the Treasury last time, and this bill which is now before the House will cover that point, and cover it fully. The bill provides, first, for a bond at a low rate of interest, 3 per cent, in order to replenish the gold reserve. The existing law authorizes the issue of bonds at 4 and 5 per cent. Some shorter term bond, redeemable at five and maturing at fifteen years, as this bill provides, ought to take the place of the long-time bonds of the act of 1875, but circumstances might arise rendering it impossible to float a 3 per cent bond at par, and therefore it becomes necessary, in the opinion of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the old law shall be retained. The second section of this bill provides a method of raising funds in case of a temporary deficiency in the revenues.

That, it seems to me, ought to be passed. It is not proposed by this bill to retire the greenbacks, but to maintain them. I, for one, believe that the retention of the greenback is essential to the maintenance of the parity of the money of this country; that if the Government "goes out of the banking business," as has been so often suggested, the result would be that the duty of maintaining that parity would fall upon the bankers alone, and I fear that they would not be equal to the task if it should involve any loss.

In 1893, when the Treasury came into the breach and sold bonds and maintained the parity of all our money—if that duty had fallen on the bankers would they have maintained that parity at a loss to themselves? Banks are not eleemosynary institutions; they are organized to make money; and instead of helping to maintain the parity in the panic of 1893 they even failed to pay their ordinary certificates of deposit in coin, silver, copper, or paper of any kind. I do not blame them for this, but it shows that we can not rely upon the banks to maintain the quality of our paper money if to do so would involve them in any loss. The greenback, on the other hand, has been maintained by the Government. The amount of the issue has not been excessive; and although it has cost something to maintain this currency, the result has been to equalize all the different kinds of money, and the saving of interest greatly exceeds any expense in which the Government has been involved by the issuance of these notes.

That condition of things has been recognized in this bill. The last Congress, the Republican side of it at least, voted almost unanimously for substantially the same proposition which is before the House at the present moment. When that proposition was offered there was scarcely a dissenting voice in regard to it on this side of the Chamber. Now that we have the power in this body to strengthen the public credit by tendering to the Treasury these two forms of bonds, it seems to me we ought to do so frankly and fully, and at the same time tie the hands of the Secretary as against any more such sales. Let us have no more dark-lantern bond syndicates.

Yesterday we sent over to the other end of the Capitol a revenue bill—a bill in regard to which the only complaint from the other side is that it may produce more revenue than the country will need at this particular time. We know full well that if we have a surplus we can get rid of it by the purchase or payment of bonds in carrying on the Government, but when a deficiency comes that deficiency is not merely a danger to the Government, it is a danger to every institution that has credit in the United States. If the Treasury is sick the whole body politic will also suffer. Our entire financial system is so interwoven that the credit of the nation is essential to the credit of its people.

We have been told that we should not stir up the tariff again in this Congress; that the American people need rest. Mr. Speaker, I deny that. It is not rest that the American people need; it is work; it is employment; and they have been out of that since the Democratic party came into power more than two years ago.

Mr. MILES. Who was it that suggested that the country needed a rest from tariff agitation? Was it not the man who is responsible for the measure pending before this House and the one which passed yesterday?

Mr. LACEY. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MILES. To the Speaker of this House.

Mr. LACEY. As I understand, the gentleman to whom reference is made has been charged with having some connection with the passage of the bill which went through the House yesterday, he having organized the "conspiracy" in the Committee on Rules by which that bill passed through this House. Now, if he is charged with saying that the country needed entire rest from tariff agitation, he certainly gave a full answer to that charge yesterday by aiding in the passage of that bill, which will give work to some portion of the American people.

Mr. MILES. Do you deny that he did say what I have stated?

Mr. LACEY. He did not say it in the sense in which my friend would imply.

Mr. MILES. Explain, then, the sense in which he used the language, if it was not in reference to the tariff. Was the language intended in some Pickwickian sense, as a friend near me suggests?

Mr. LACEY. The suggestion was simply this, that the tariff question should not be agitated in the present Congress in the form of a general revision, with a hostile President of the United States and an uncertain body at the other end of the Capitol. In this House, thanks to the people, there is Republican strength enough to pass such a bill as ought to be passed in the interests of the American people by a two-thirds majority. But that situation does not prevail elsewhere. An agitation such as would open up the entire question is not, therefore, now desirable. That I understand to be the full scope of the remark to which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] refers. But on the other hand it is necessary to increase revenues, and this side of the House has decided to do that in the line of a tariff bill which will give at least some partial relief to the Treasury on the one hand and to the people out of employment on the other. There will be some protection in its added revenue.

Mr. HYDE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HYDE. Is there anything in this bill to prevent or arrest the continuance of the scandalous bond transactions which have been carried on in the past by the President, Mr. Stetson, and Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, as referred to by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LACEY. I do not understand that under the Constitution we can pass an act for the punishment of anything which may have been done in that connection; such an act would be an ex post facto law. That act was committed last year.

Mr. HYDE. I ask whether this bill does anything to prevent the continuance of such transactions.

Mr. LACEY. This bill prevents any such wrong in the future, because it requires that hereafter bonds shall only be sold by being offered to the public.

Mr. HYDE. Does this bill contain any provision which will prevent those men from continuing to do as they have done?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman has not read this bill very closely or he would understand that it provides that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized by this act, or by the resumption act, they must be offered at public sale. In this way the bill provides against the recurrence of the evils which even our friends on the other side must concede have existed in the last bond transaction. No one on either side ought to be proud of that transaction. No one on either side, I apprehend, will be found to advocate it.

Mr. COX. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. When you provide in one part of this bill for the redemption of the greenbacks by the issue of bonds which are to be paid in coin, and at the same time provide for meeting deficiencies in the Treasury by the issue of certificates which are to be paid in lawful money, what do you mean? What are you driving at?

Mr. LACEY. I think I heard my friend ask that question a while ago of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], the framer of this bill, who certainly gave the gentleman a very full and satisfactory answer.

Mr. COX. The answer was not at all satisfactory. I hope I shall get from the gentleman from Iowa a better one. I am happy to say I did not get much information on that subject.

Mr. LACEY. If my friend did not understand then, I fear he will not understand now. But I will give him the suggestions which occur to me as to the purposes of the bill. There are two purposes of the bill. The first is to provide for the redemption of greenbacks in order to maintain them on a parity with gold and to keep up the necessary reserve fund of the Treasury——

Mr. COX. I understand that.

Mr. LACEY. The second is—and it is a circumstance not likely to arise if the tariff bill of yesterday becomes a law—but if it does become necessary to borrow money to pay the expenses of the Government, there will be no jugglery, no hocus-pocus about it; no sale of bonds for gold and the payment of gold out for greenbacks and the reissue of the greenbacks in the running expenses of the Government. But if there is a deficiency the money will be borrowed straight out with the certificates from the people, by issuing small-sized exchequer bonds, and when they are issued they will create a fund in the Treasury to be used for the current governmental expenses. I hope I have made it clear and plain to my friend from Tennessee at last.

Mr. COX. Now, you say you issue a certificate to pay the deficit of the Government expenditures. What will you pay them in?

Mr. LACEY. I have already answered my friend. These bonds are payable——

Mr. COX. Will you pay in gold, silver, or greenbacks?

Mr. LACEY (continuing). In the lawful money of the United States—gold, silver, or greenbacks.

Mr. COX. Why not make the bonds payable the same way?

Mr. LACEY. Because they are issued to raise coin.

Mr. COX. That is all right. You mean gold bonds, then?

Mr. LACEY. They are payable in coin, and are issued for the purpose of getting coin. That is the identical thing they are issued to procure. They must be paid in the same way, while the ordinary expenses of the Government are paid in the lawful money of the United States.

This bill appeals to the people in the hour of need. It is safer to rely upon the patriotic citizens of the United States than upon any speculating syndicates of foreign capital.

France appealed to her people in her hour of need when the Republic was only a few months old, and did not appeal in vain. We can as safely trust the people of this country.

Whether this bill shall become a law or not, it will meet with the approval of the sober judgment of the country.

It will furnish relief to the Treasury until a different Administration and a different policy shall relieve a depleted exchequer and a suffering people.

It forbids the retirement of the greenbacks and strengthens, without contracting, the currency.

It answers Mr. Cleveland's message in a practical and straightforward way. He demands the issuance of gold bonds, and insists that all efforts to maintain silver as money shall be abandoned. This bill returns a positive negative to his demand.

He asks for the contraction of the currency to the amount of $500,000,000, without even suggesting any circulating medium to take its place. To this extraordinary demand the bill gives answer.

The representatives of the people should recognize the difficulties of the situation, and the danger of another syndicated assault upon the Treasury and promptly pass this bill, which will render such methods impossible in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state the reasons why I, as a Republican, oppose this bill. [Applause.] I went over my district in California recently, and upon every stump in that district I proclaimed the undying hostility of the Republican party to the issuance of bonds in the time of peace. [Applause.] I proclaimed the undying hostility of the Republican party to the action of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury in issuing bonds in time of profound peace to defray deficiencies in the revenues, caused by their own conduct, in making contracts with a bond syndicate, that would not bear investigation by a hostile Congress. [Renewed applause.] And I regard this bill as giving the lie to everything we said before the elections in reference to the issuing of bonds; and for one I can never by any act or vote of mine condone what I believe to be an error not merely of the heart, but of the head; not merely of general policy, but an error arising almost to the dignity of an offense against the commonwealth, of allowing the bonds of the United States Government to be taken and controlled in the manner they were by the Treasury of the United States and a bond syndicate in a time of profound peace. [Applause.]

This bill, in my judgment, stamps the seal of approval by the Republican party upon the action of these officers and upon the issuance of these bonds in the manner I have stated. It continues in force the laws which now authorize the selling of bonds at 4 per cent and at 5 per cent, and in addition to that gives authority to the Treasury to issue bonds at 3 per cent.

But ah! the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says we ought to be patriotic, and that the American people will rise equal to the occasion and take the bonds at 3 per cent when they would be willing to give a foreigner 5 per cent on them. I am in favor of the protection of American industries, and if a man is rich and is willing to loan his money to the Government, I want him to have as good a rate of interest as would be given to the Rothschilds or to that great power across the ocean which is willing to aid us in the war which we may perhaps have with the once mother country of this nation. I am opposed to it also because it does attempt to retire the greenbacks—because it does retire the greenbacks, as I look at the law. I am one of those who believe the greenbacks to be the best currency we have ever had in the United States. I am old enough to remember the days before the war, and I remember that then when you went out of your own town, your own county, or your own State, into any other county or State in the nation, you were obliged to take a Thompson's Bank Note Reporter with you and change it every week in order to know whether you were getting good money or bad.

Now, the greenback goes current in any State of this American Union, and it ought to be protected and not injured in the house of its friends [applause], for we Republicans originated it. I believe this bill will retire the greenbacks because of the second section of the bill, which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right to issue short-term certificates with which to pay the necessary expenses of the Government. If he issues those certificates to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, and at the same time if he issues bonds and redeems the greenbacks, as he has a right to do, emphasized and almost demanded by this bill, what is to become of the greenbacks? He will not need them to defray the expenses of the Government, because he will have these short-term certificates, and the greenbacks will remain locked up in the Treasury vaults of the nation, and the currency will be contracted to that extent and nothing given in lieu. [Applause.]

I am opposed to this because it contradicts all the Republican platforms and all the Republican conventions and all the Republican speeches that ever I heard or made or wrote upon the question of the finances.

Yesterday, against my will, against my protest, I voted for a bill which in my judgment was unnecessary, which in my judgment was not a Republican measure, which in my judgment did not meet the case, which in my judgment was not what we were sent here to do. [Applause.] Because I believe that the verdict of the nation, in 1894, was that we should have a protective tariff, and not a tariff for revenue only [applause]; that the election of 1894 stamped the seal of approval upon the McKinley bill and upon Bill McKinley himself, to the extent of indorsing the protective policy by him advocated. [Applause.] Therefore I was opposed to the bill which passed this House yesterday. I voted for it because the men who claimed to be the leaders of the Republican party said that it was right; for I am one of that unfortunate class called new members. I am simply kneeling at the feet of the political Gamaliels who run and control the Republican party here. [Laughter.] I am simply swallowing the drippings of the sanctuary, not the sweets of the inner table. [Laughter.] I admire the courage and revere the ability of these men, and yesterday I voted for that bill because they said it was right; but I was in the condition of the Irishman who had never seen any peaches before, who was given some to eat. He ate ravenously, and then he was asked how they tasted. Said he: "Sure, sir, they tasted very good, but the seeds scratched my throat going down." [Laughter.] And so, sir, my throat was scratched yesterday in voting for a Democratic tariff bill for revenue only. [Applause and laughter.] And if I know myself, never again during the short time that I occupy a seat upon this floor will I vote for any Democratic bills to help a Democratic President out of trouble. [Applause.]

Now, to-day we are called upon to undo all the work we did yesterday. To-day we are called upon to contradict everything that we said, everything that we did, and every vote that we cast yesterday. We were told yesterday by speeches upon the Republican side that the tariff bill which we then passed would give the necessary revenue to carry on the Government, that it made $44,000,000 in addition to that which we now receive. We were told by the distinguished gentlemen upon the Democratic side that we did not need the bill, that we have $70,000,000 in the Treasury already to pay the expenses of the Government. But we passed the bill, and now we were either wrong yesterday, and the Democrats were right, or we are wrong to-day in attempting to pass this bill; for after having passed the tariff bill to give $44,000,000 more of revenue, we now propose to pass a bond bill to give them $50,000,000 of certificates, and God knows how many hundred millions of dollars of short-time bonds, to build up a Treasury that we said yesterday—and voted also—a horizontal raise would fill up inside of a few months. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, I am not in favor of that kind of legislation. I am in favor of taking a stand and abiding by it. I am in favor of standing by what we believe to be right. In deciding this question I thank the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that he opened the debate by saying that this should not be decided upon a partisan basis, but should be regarded as a business proposition. I thank him for that, because it enables us Republicans—and I feel that there are many who agree with me—it enables those Republicans who feel as I do to vote against this bill and not fear that we shall be read out of the party by those who seek to control it. [Applause.] As a Republican I am against it. It is not a Republican doctrine. It is not Republican pap that we ought to drink at the present time. [Laughter and applause.] It is something which will do us no good. It is something which will do us harm. It can only be justified upon the ground that there is an emergency.

Every gentleman upon this floor who has spoken in favor of the bill has undertaken to tell us about a crisis. Why, as I listened to these gentlemen and heard them talk about the crisis they struck me as being men who wake up in the morning and look out of the window and see a nasty crisis right there in their front dooryard. [Laughter.] And when they go to bed at night, following the example of the women, will look under the bed to see whether they find any such crisis facing them there. [Laughter.] I deny for one that there is any crisis in the land. I believe that the wheels of industry are commencing to revolve again. I believe that we are on the eve of good times, and I for one am not willing to vote for a bill that violates every tenet, principle, and practice of the Republican party because some eloquent gentlemen have conjured up crises right under their bed, out of their own heads, and without facts to justify them. [Applause.]

I am opposed to this bill because it is absolutely unnecessary. Why? Because whether we tell the truth or do not, we might as well believe we tell the truth, even if we have a doubt about it. [Laughter.] We said yesterday, those Republicans who spoke upon the revenue bill, so called, said by their speeches, and those of us who silently followed our leaders who have taken us into trouble [laughter]—those of us who said by our votes that we indorsed those speeches said when you had this tariff bill which raised the revenues it gave $44,000,000 more revenue, and that was enough. All right. If we were correct yesterday, in the name of common sense what has occurred in twenty-four hours to change our minds? [Laughter.] Is it possible that anybody can see the shadow of the silver question arising upon the horizon to complicate this question and create this crisis of which we hear so much? I want to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON]—I know him not except officially, but trust we will be friends by reason of greater intimacy in the future—I say that for one, speaking only as one man, there is absolutely no fear comes into my mind at the use of the silver dollar by the people of these United States. [Loud applause on the Democratic side and by part of the Republicans.]

But there is nothing of silver in this. It is a pure, simple question of business, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] said—pure and simple. Do we need it? If so, why? We do not need it for pure principles of patriotism. No man can exceed me in devotion to this country. No man will answer more quickly to the springs of patriotism when touched by the master hand of any man on this floor, Republican or Democrat. But what is there of patriotism in this? Nothing—absolutely nothing, except the privilege of loaning money at a decent rate of interest. I listened to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], learned, distinguished, and able as he is, and I heard him say that it is a patriotic duty to vote for this bill. Why? He gave no reason, except to say that it was a patriotic duty. I do not believe it is the patriotic duty of any man to increase his debts, either private or public. I believe it is the duty of the individual to keep his expenditures inside of his receipts. As Wilkins Micawber, him of almost historic fame, and the best financier in the world, according to his own lights—as Wilkins Micawber said:

> Income, £20 annually; expenditures, £19 19s. 11¼d.—result, happiness. Annual income, £20; annual expenditures, £20 ¼d.—result, unhappiness.

[Laughter.]

So let us keep our revenues equal to or not in excess of our expenditures, and there will be no need of any bond issue in time of peace. [Applause.]

But there was one argument presented by the gentleman from Ohio that I think ought to be repudiated by every Republican. He says that we ought to vote for this bill because the Democrats did not suggest anything better. Is that a business way of looking at a proposition? Let us look at the proposition itself regardless of everything else. Now, I do not regard it as the duty of the Democratic party on this floor to present anything. God knows they present themselves, and that is bad enough. [Great laughter.] We want no help from them. Our party is large enough and strong enough and great enough to evolve out of the wisdom of its own members measures that are sufficient to help the country. [Applause.] We ask no assistance from them, except to silently submit to the rules we adopt and the laws we pass. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, I think that this bill should be beaten. I think particularly the first section of the bill should be beaten. There is no party whip cracking here; every man can vote for himself and vote his own sentiments, either as a Republican, a Democrat, or a Populist. I ask all Republicans who believe in Republican principles, who believe in doing something because it is right, and not because it is expedient, to vote in favor of the motions that will be made against this bill, and to vote against it.

The Republican party always triumphs when it stands for the right. The Republican party always fails when it attempts to wrestle with the right and to let party expediency be brought to the front instead of deciding in favor of the right. We have been always against the issuance of bonds in time of peace. Let us adhere to the ancient landmarks of the party. Let us support Republican principles. Let us support Republican doctrines. Let us vote against this bill. In that way we will be assuming the responsibility of the occasion, and it is better for us to assume the responsibility and be right than to attempt to play peanut politics with the President of these United States and pass bills because they are expedient and may put him in a hole. [Laughter.]

I am not anxious to put the President of the United States or anyone else in a hole. I want to do that which is right. I want to do that which my party believes to be right. I want to do that which is for the benefit of the country. I want no politics in this question of finance, because there ought not to be any. I believe that every Republican upon this floor will be standing firmly by the landmarks of his party and will be deciding in favor of the right if he votes against this bill, and thereby announces now and forever that the Republican party of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress will not denounce the Democrats for issuing bonds in time of peace, and then immediately turn around as soon as it comes into power and vote for the issue of bonds in time of peace. [Applause.]

Let us be consistent with our party record. Let us stand by the rule which we adopted many years ago, that we will not issue bonds in time of peace, but that we will pile up revenue and tariff rates, even if we have to reenact the McKinley tariff bill, until the receipts of the Government exceed its expenditures. [Applause.] Gentlemen ask us what we can do under the circumstances except to pass this bill. Why, sir, to me, a poor, suffering, new member, it seems the easiest thing in the world to correctly answer this question. [Laughter.] Just strike out the words "four" and "five" in the existing law and insert "three," if there is any magic in a 3 per cent bond, and that gives you exactly this bill. What is the objection to that plan? You have a law on the statute book which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds at 4 and 5 per cent, but you say that that is wrong, and you say you do not want to retire the greenbacks. Very well, strike out "four" and "five" and insert "three" and you have accomplished all that you desire, and have not even by indirection attacked the greenbacks.

There is another way. Enact a bill which has been introduced, I believe, by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] requiring the customs dues to be paid in gold wherever imports are made from any country that requires gold upon its imports. That will give relief. Or, if you wish to do that which in my judgment will also give great relief, do what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] says we must not do—provide for the free coinage of silver. [Laughter.] That will relieve your difficulties.

Mr. DOVENER. I thought the gentleman would come to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The gentleman says he thought I would come to that. Of course he did, because he knows that it is right, and that is why I have come to it. [Laughter.]

Again, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that as a citizen I am opposed to this bill, as a humble taxpayer I am opposed to this bill, as a humble member of the Republican party I am opposed to this bill, and I hope that all Republicans here will vote against it, in order that we may all have the satisfaction of saying that we voted once this session in favor of the principles of the Republican party and not in favor of expediency. [Laughter and prolonged applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that my friend and namesake from California who has just addressed the House has to some extent lost sight of the spirit of Republicanism in following too closely and too faithfully the letter of a formula of his own making not warranted by any party platform or tradition. We paid as we went and made both ends meet in the national housekeeping.

The general idea which my friend announces is correct, but the language in which he clothes it is misleading. It is not true that the traditional policy of the Republican party forbids the issuance of bonds in time of peace. That is not a correct statement. The Republican party has issued bonds in time of peace. It authorized the issuance of bonds for the resumption of specie payments in time of peace. The doctrine of the Republican party on that subject is this: It is not the custom or the policy of the Republican party to run the Government in such a way as to make it necessary to issue bonds to pay the current expenses of the Government in time of peace. The law authorizing the sale of bonds for the resumption of specie payments was placed upon the statute book by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President (General Grant) in 1875, and for four years we endured the hostility and the ridicule of our opponents, who said that it would be utterly impossible to resume specie payments in 1879; but, plodding faithfully and steadily in that direction, another Republican Congress and another Republican President, in 1878, in time of peace, mind you, actually sold the bonds, established the gold reserve, and redeemed our pledge of coin resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879. We did issue bonds in time of profound peace, and have never apologized for it. We have never been either repudiated by our friends or successfully assailed by our enemies for that action.

We do not make the point of extravagance in public expenditures, although there is much more ground for it than there was when they used it with such effect against us after the Fifty-first Congress.

Our first complaint is that the Democrats repealed a law which afforded both protection and ample revenue, and substituted for it a measure that failed either to protect the industries and wages of the people or to produce sufficient revenues for the public Treasury.

Our second complaint is that when the policy of tariff for revenue only had done its natural work and produced its inevitable result, when a deficit had succeeded a surplus, when the reserve was encroached upon and confidence shaken, then we complained, not in the abstract against selling bonds in time of peace—every State and municipality in the country does that—but, first, against selling bonds ostensibly to maintain the redemption fund and then diverting the proceeds to pay current expenses; and our third complaint is that the bonds were sold secretly to a mixed syndicate of American and foreign favorites for about $10,000,000 less than they were worth in the open market.

The syndicate delivered 3,500,000 ounces of gold at $17.80441 per ounce, which is .80024 per ounce less than the Government rate, so that it paid a premium of 4.494 per cent for the bonds. It received bonds amounting to $62,315,400, and paid the Government $65,116,275 in gold at its valuation. Immediately the new and larger syndicate offered the bonds to the public at 112.25; or $69,949,075 for the whole issue, making a profit of $4,832,800, including the commission to the management above stated, so that the final profits divided among the members who did not take any of the bonds themselves was 6.675 per cent on their investment. But many of them—it is not known how many—took part of the bonds offered to the public, and those who did so shared the further profit in the advance of the bonds from 112.25 to 120 in less than two months, and 122.5 in less than three months. These latter, therefore, realized in three months 18 per cent on their advance, or 6 per cent a month. If they held a little longer, the bonds were still going to the public in July at 123.75 to 124.12. At the highest point the profit over the price at which the Government sold was 19.63 per cent, or $12,557,461, and at 122½, at which price or higher the bonds were sold for several months continually, the profits were $11,720,929.

My friend from California hopes especially that the first section of the bill will be defeated. Let me read to him a part of that first section and ask him whether he seriously wishes to go upon record as voting against the proposition:

> Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875, he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

Is my friend prepared to say that he denounces that part of this bill?

A vote against that section of the bill is a vote against amending the resumption act so as to compel the present Secretary of the Treasury to do what the Republican Secretary did as a matter of course in 1878, viz, to sell the bonds—if bonds must be sold—publicly in the open American market.

We are not honored with the confidence of the President or a special message on the subject. But everybody knows the Administration is about to sell more bonds, variously estimated at from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. The papers are full of it. Here is a sample, which I read from the New York Tribune of this morning:

> TALK ABOUT THE BONDS—WALL STREET THINKS ANOTHER SYNDICATE HAS BEEN FORMED—NEITHER AUGUST BELMONT NOR J. PIERPONT MORGAN WILL CONFIRM OR DENY THE REPORT—IT IS BELIEVED THE ISSUE WILL BE PLACED IN THIS COUNTRY—EFFECTS ON STOCKS.
> All the talk in Wall street yesterday was about the forthcoming issue of Government bonds. It was believed that a contract had been entered into for the sale by the Treasury Department to a syndicate headed by J. Pierpont Morgan and August Belmont of $100,000,000 thirty-year 4 per cent coin bonds.

When Mr. Sherman, as Secretary of the Treasury, in 1878, created the gold reserve, large discretion was given to him (as it is given to the present Secretary); but he advertised the bonds for sale and sold them at market price, so that the Treasury got the benefit of every cent they brought. He placed them for sale in the United States and gave our own citizens thirty days' preference before any of them were offered for sale elsewhere. If the present Secretary had pursued that course in his issue of bonds there would have been little or no criticism of the way in which it was done, if the necessity for any bond sale were once admitted.

The strife between parties is not so much as to the amount of money to be collected as how it is to be collected. In the Fifty-first Congress and in the campaign following we were roundly denounced upon every stump as an extravagant, wicked, and utterly abandoned party; we were charged with being "a billion-dollar Congress." And upon that and other cries we were for the time being swept from power. Our opponents came in and took charge of the Government. They tried as conscientiously and as earnestly as men on this floor ever did to redeem the pledges of retrenchment, economy, and reform which they had made on the stump, to keep within the billion-dollar limit; but they could not do it. The real strife is not as to how much money we shall expend, but as to how that money shall be collected. In the early history of our party we took charge of this Government. It had then a bankrupt Treasury; its credit was so low that its bonds and other obligations were selling at a rate of discount which made the interest 12 per cent. In the course of thirty years of Republican supremacy we quadrupled the value of that credit; we reduced interest to 3 per cent; we paid over $2,000,000,000 of the public debt; and we did it in such a way that instead of impoverishing the people and reducing the amount of available property we quadrupled the wealth of the people of this country. We never made any of those advances by refusing to pay our honest obligations. No matter how they were incurred, no matter how they were forced upon us, if the debts were once made, if the bills were once incurred, we walked up manfully and either paid them, if we had the money, or gave our bonds, and thus pledged the public faith of the nation for future payment. When a private individual or a nation has lawfully incurred expenses, no matter whether by blunders or crimes, there are only two ways to meet the condition honorably—either to pay cash or else to give a proper obligation to pay when able.

The facts of the situation now are that by circumstances over which we have no control, by the verdict of the American people, lawfully rendered on that fateful November day in 1892, the policy under which we prospered during a whole generation was reversed, and what was dearest to us as the corner stone of Republicanism was severely condemned as the "culminating atrocity" of legislation in the Democratic platform of 1892, and, for the time being, overthrown by the tariff act of 1894.

From that day to this the Government has been constantly running behind in its expenses, the amount reaching $133,000,000 in the course of about two years and a half. We find now that our revenues are not sufficient to meet our ordinary expenditures. Such has always been the result of Democratic policy, and never the result of Republican policy, as the following table will show:

Year ended June 30—	Customs revenue.	Excess of revenue over expenditure.	Excess of expenditure over revenue.

The excess of expenditures from 1861 to 1865 were war expenses, and the excess of revenue over expenses during Cleveland's first Administration was because we still held the Republican Senate, so that the Democrats had to govern the country according to Republican laws.

The same contrast between Republican and Democratic policies stands out in its effects on the public debt. They increase debt; we reduce it.

The reduction of the national debt by four-year periods is given on March 1 of each fourth year as follows, cents omitted:

March 1, 1869	$280,430,492
March 1, 1873	403,948,484
March 1, 1877	65,204,017
March 1, 1881	73,646,781
March 1, 1885	480,161,932
March 1, 1889	341,448,449
March 1, 1893	236,527,666
Total reduction of	1,881,367,873

Then there was a change of policy and also a change of results. On March 1, 1895, the national debt had been increased by $105,328,774, and on December 1, 1895, by $57,273,470, making the total increase since March 1, 1893, $162,602,245.

The present Administration, in the exercise of a lawful authority which we placed upon the statute book, has sold bonds to meet those deficiencies. We complain only of the manner in which those bonds were sold; and we are trying now to prevent a recurrence of such abuses. We are proposing a measure which, instead of allowing bonds to be sold secretly to a foreign syndicate without advertisement and at a price $10,000,000 more than they were worth at that time in the market, requires our bonds to be sold in our own market at public sale—first to our own citizens.

This is not a question of bonds or no bonds. This Administration has already decided to issue more bonds no matter what action this House may take. By defeating this bill we in effect tell the President to go on selling bonds in the manner his Secretary of the Treasury has been doing under existing law. By passing the bill we say that these scandals must stop, and that if bonds must be sold to meet the obligations of the Government they must be short-time, low-interest bonds, and that they must be sold publicly at places convenient and accessible to our own citizens.

In the President's annual message to Congress this year there is no discussion of the tariff. He only refers to it incidentally when he expresses his satisfaction at the enormous increase of imports of South American wool since wool was put on the free list.

It never occurred to him to grieve over the corresponding decrease in our own wool product.

The difference between free trade and protection is well illustrated in our wool and woolen imports:

Imports for 10 months.	1894.	1895.
Raw wool ..... pounds..	83,223,270	211,057,038
Shoddy ..... do....	1,081,441	17,823,008
Carpets ..... square yards..	265,314	829,423
Clothing	$673,088	$1,296,210
Cloths ..... pounds..	5,317,056	34,573,887
Dress goods ..... square yards..	32,761,465	25,976,470
Knit woolens	$593,669	$1,988,349
Shawls	$69,553	$370,264
Yarns ..... pounds..	383,985	3,383,285
All other woolens	$542,235	$1,919,785

This turn in the tide of our commerce had three effects:

First. It cut off from the Treasury a stream of gold in the shape of duties heretofore paid.

Second. It sent to South America and Australia a stream of gold that should have gone to North Dakota, Arizona, Ohio, and other localities within this Union.

Third. It compelled us to find gold, and only gold, with which to pay the foreigner, instead of the paper and silver which are taken just as readily as gold in all commercial transactions among our own citizens.

The same drain on our wealth, and especially on our gold, to pay for cheap imports, and the same destruction of home industries, as we have seen in wool and woolens, has operated in the other schedules.

Nothing short of a reversal of this policy and a return to the Republican policy of living within our income—selling more than we buy, and not importing so extensively what can be advantageously produced at home—will ever bring permanent relief. That will do it. It has done it before and will do it again.

For thirteen years—from its creation in 1879 until we lost control of it in 1892—there was no run on the gold reserve. There will be none when the same conditions are again restored under Republican supremacy. That day can not come too soon to suit the American people.

Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] desire to address the House?

Mr. WHEELER. I will take the floor now, if the Chair will recognize me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how much time has been occupied, but the gentleman is a member of the committee, and is entitled to the floor if he asks it. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I should not have felt called upon to address the House upon this question had the discussion been confined to the propriety of the passage of the bill now before the House, which is so manifestly objectionable with its inconsistencies and unwise provisions, but the debate has taken a very wide range, involving the entire currency and coinage question. The gentlemen on this side of the House who have spoken upon the bill this morning are among the very few Democratic Representatives who are avowed advocates of the gold standard and currency contraction, and as the majority of the Democrats on this side believe that such legislation will be detrimental to the producing and industrial classes of our people, I feel that something should be said in the interest of this most numerous and deserving body of citizens.

There is no one in this House who regrets more than myself to differ from our distinguished President and Secretary of the Treasury upon any subject; but in a question like this, so entirely one of business and which so differently affects the people of different sections and different vocations, we must obey the admonition which appears in many of the messages which President Cleveland has sent to this body, that the duty of every member of Congress is to seek to advance the interests of the constituents he represents on this floor.

MONEYED MEN MADE RICHER BY THE GOLD STANDARD.

Not only do we not criticise, but we expect the gold or single standard to be advocated by those who represent constituencies which largely include the creditor classes, money lenders, or those receiving salaries, annuities, or any character of fixed incomes. Their sole purpose is to reduce the amount of money of ultimate redemption and thus increase the purchasing power of the money they possess.

When the vast gold discoveries in California and Australia were made known, these same people demanded the demonetization of gold, and they were very earnest in their arguments that as silver was the harder of the two metals and less liable to abrasion, it should be adopted as the standard.

Holland, a great money-lending country, was the first to move. Gold was demonetized and silver was adopted as the standard in that country.

I read from the Encyclopædia Britannica, page 736:

The result of the gold discoveries in Australia and California was to greatly increase the supply of that metal, and, under the action of Gresham's law, to change the French currency from silver to gold, while Holland, to avoid the evils which were anticipated from the reduced value of that metal, adopted silver as the standard.

These astute people saw that the relative production of gold would rapidly increase as compared to that of silver, and they therefore hastened to demonetize the metal which promised the largest yield; but in 1873 the production of silver largely increased, and the moneyed people, solely for the purpose of decreasing the amount of money of ultimate redemption and increasing their own power, demanded the demonetization of silver.

UNSCRUPULOUS EFFORTS OF MONEYED MEN.

Money and moneyed people are unscrupulous in the extreme in efforts to carry out their purposes. This was appreciated by Macaulay, who often referred to the cupidity of the creditor class. This great writer said:

If large financial interests were interested in denying the law of gravitation that proposition would be ably disputed.

This expression of Macaulay's has been most forcibly exemplified by the action of the moneyed class for the past few years in this country and in England. They first induced the Executive, without regard to party, to advocate their views, and then proceeded to bring their power to bear upon Congress and the people. They have established a bureau in the city of New York, which has flooded the country with millions and tens of millions of documents advocating the gold standard. In addition to this they have arranged to print supplements to newspapers in cities of the South and West, which supplements are sent free to any papers which will circulate them with their issues. These supplements are filled with ably written, misleading, and, in many instances, utterly unwarranted assertions.

GOLD STANDARD BRINGS DISTRESS TO THE FARMER.

I repeat that while we do not criticise the gentlemen from New York and New England for advocating legislation which will double the fortunes of their constituents, they must not criticise the representatives of the producing classes for insisting upon legislation which is absolutely essential to their prosperity. While legislation reducing the amount of money in the country benefits those who own money, its inevitable result is to injure the great producing class. It is but natural that Mr. Cleveland should advocate the gold standard, because nearly all the people with whom he is associated would be benefited by such legislation. In his annual message the President said:

Everyone who receives a fixed salary would find the dollar in his hand ruthlessly scaled down to the point of bitter disappointment if not to pinching privation.

Mr. Cleveland has always lived in a city, his business relations have always been with people in cities, and he has had very little, if anything, to do with the millions of farmers and farm laborers throughout the country.

Secretary Morton, in a recent interview, also expressed the same idea, and added that he wanted the American dollar "to have the largest possible purchasing power."

We can understand why Mr. Morton takes this view. For the last two years he has been surrounded by people who draw fixed salaries, and it is plain to see that their comforts would be increased just in proportion as the purchasing power of their salaries is enhanced. Secretary Morton seems to forget that for money "to have the largest possible purchasing power" inevitably means that the wheat, cotton, corn, and all other products of the farm shall be sold at the least price possible, which means the utter degradation and ruin of the most valuable interests in our land, and that it would finally result in the absolute inability of the Government to employ these officials at any salary whatever. And he also forgets that the history of the world shows that Governments which legislate for the great producing classes become powerful, rich, and happy, while those which legislate in favor of the creditor and salaried classes deteriorate and decay.

The house of the Rothschilds has always striven to reduce prices. At the monetary conference at Brussels Baron Rothschild urged that the United States demonetize silver, and when reminded that such a course would produce a fall in the price of commodities, which would be followed by distress, this great capitalist of the house of Rothschild said:

I hold that wheat at 30s. a quarter instead of 45s. is rather a blessing than otherwise.

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], for whom during the last fourteen years I have learned to entertain the most profound respect, tells us that silver coinage will reduce the value of everything in this country.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman from Alabama is entirely mistaken as to my statement.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will take back what he said.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. On the contrary, the "gentleman from Georgia" reiterates his statement with all due submission to the better judgment of his friend from Alabama. My statement was that if the Treasury paid out silver now on coin obligations it would precipitate a panic.

SECRETARY CARLISLE'S SUGGESTION.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I accept the gentleman's correction, but I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia that any such effect would result from a proper exercise of the authority given by law to the Secretary of the Treasury. When it was proposed last winter to sell bonds to raise $65,000,000 in gold I prepared an amendment to the bill, which reads as follows:

That after the $65,000,000 in gold secured by this contract has been received by the Treasury the payment of all obligations which are payable in gold or silver at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury shall be paid partly in gold and partly in silver, in the proportion in which the two metals are held by the Treasury on the day the payments are made.

This is substantially what has been done and is now being done by the Bank of France and other European banks, and no panic has ever resulted and it has never disturbed the parity between the two metals.

On the 21st of last January Secretary Carlisle admitted the propriety and advisability of such action. In a printed report of that date he said:

If the policy of reserving to the Government, at the beginning of the resumption, the option of redeeming in gold or silver all its paper presented had been adopted, I believe it would have worked beneficially and there would have been no trouble growing out of it.

If it would have been judicious to have adopted this course at that time it would be judicious to do it now. I believe that Mr. Carlisle could well have added that no serious trouble would arise from such action now, and certainly no trouble would come from it compared to the serious trouble and distress which is inevitable if we continue the present system. At least we ought to try the experiment. Were it not that the rule adopted by the House prevents the possibility of proposed amendments, I would suggest one similar to the amendment which I proposed last winter. If the plan works well in France, where the ratio of silver to gold is 15½ to 1, why would it not work well here where the ratio is 16 to 1? Such was the plan contemplated by the legislation by which the currency obligations were created, and I am thoroughly convinced it would stop the presentation of currency obligations for the purpose of drawing gold from the Treasury. We would, therefore, prevent any further menace to the Treasury, and it would be done in a way most beneficial to the industrial and producing class of our country.

WHAT CAUSES A PANIC?

A panic in the commercial world is an effort on the part of numerous people to sell stocks, bonds, or other property for money. The reason why they do this is that they believe that the property they have will fall in value and they desire to change their property into money, which they believe will, at a future time, buy more of the same property. It is simply a very general belief that property will fall and that money will rise in value. In times of panic people who have money refuse to lend it, because they think it to their advantage to hold the money until values reach their lowest point, when it will be profitable for them to invest. At all times when money is withdrawn from commercial or manufacturing enterprises, it is simply because the owners of the money believe that that money is about to increase in value; in other words, that its purchasing power is about to be enhanced. They also fear that the property offered as security for the money which is sought for will fall in value and in a short time the security will be insufficient.

SUFFICIENT MONEY INCREASES PRICES.

The most potent elements in regulating values are supply and demand. When money is abundant the tendency is for it to fall in value, or, what is the same thing, for property to rise in value. This law is as certain and inevitable as the rising and setting of the sun. The history of the world shows that whenever any legislation is had which tends to decrease the amount of money prices of all kinds of property fall in value, or, what is the same thing, money rises in value; and, on the contrary, the history of the world shows that all legislation which tends to increase the amount of money tends to increase the price of property, or, what is the same thing, decrease the value of money. This principle is asserted in every work on money and political economy which has ever been published, and I believe up to this date has never been denied or questioned. The reason of this is that mankind has but one purpose and one use for money, which is, to purchase either property or labor.

The report of the Monetary Commission, dated March 2, 1877, page 49, says:

At the Christian era the metallic money of the Roman Empire amounted to $1,800,000,000. By the end of the fifteenth century it had sunk to less than $200,000,000. During this period a most extraordinary and baleful change took place in the condition of the world. Population dwindled, and commerce, arts, wealth, and freedom all disappeared. The people were reduced by poverty and misery to the most degraded conditions of serfdom and slavery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard that individual selfishness was the only thing consistent with the instinct of self-preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and as prices fell.

While other causes are in a measure responsible for the fearful conditions of society during the Dark Ages, there is no doubt that it was largely due to the shrinkage of money and the fearful depreciation in value of property that followed. The report of the Monetary Commission seems to concur in that view It says (page 49):

History records no such disastrous transition as that from the Roman Empire to the Dark Ages. Various explanations have been given of this entire breaking down of the framework of society, but it was certainly coincident with a shrinkage in the volume of money, which was also without historical parallel. The crumbling of institutions kept even step and pace with the shrinkage in the stock of money and the falling prices.

This view is sustained from the fact that this almost barbarous condition of Europe continued until after the discovery of America and the development of the rich silver mines of Potosi during the ten years following 1546, when the average annual production of silver was about $17,000,000; and this inflow of the precious metals in Europe was the dawn of the new civilization. The Monetary Commission, in referring to the energizing influence caused by the reception of silver in Europe, says:

It needed the heroic treatment of rising prices to enable society to reunite its shattered links, to shake off the shackles of feudalism, to relight and uplift the almost extinguished torch of civilization.

The commission most forcibly emphasizes this view of the subject in these words:

That the disasters of the Dark Ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices, and that the recovery therefrom and the comparative prosperity which followed the discovery of America were due to an increasing supply, the precious metals and rising prices, will not seem surprising or unreasonable when the noble functions of money are considered. Money is the great instrument of association, the very fiber of social organism, the vitalizing force of industry, the protoplasm of civilization, and as essential to its existence as oxygen is to animal life. Without money civilization could not have had a beginning; with a diminishing supply it must languish and, unless relieved, finally perish.

On page 51 the commission says:

It is in a volume of money keeping even pace with advancing population and commerce, and in the resulting steadiness of prices, that the wholesome nutriment of a healthy vitality is to be found.

I also read from page 53:

While the volume of money is decreasing, even although very slowly, the value of each unit of money is increasing in corresponding ratio, and property is falling in price. Those who have contracted to pay money find that it is constantly becoming more difficult to meet their engagements. The margins of securities melt rapidly away, and the confiscation by the creditor of the property on which they are based becomes only a question of time.

The report from which these extracts are taken is that of the monetary commission which was created by act of Congress, and consisted of three Senators, three members of the House of Representatives, and three secretaries.

[The hour of 5 having arrived, the Speaker announced a recess until 7 o'clock.]

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House stands in recess until 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. WHEELER. I suppose my time is reserved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 7 p. m. resumed its session, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] is recognized for thirty minutes, ten minutes in the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and twenty minutes in the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who had the floor when the House took the recess.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, a great issue is before the American people, and every effort is being made to obscure and counteract it. Personal appeals and personal ambitions, individual antagonisms and local prejudices, avarice, greed, bigotry, and proscription, and every other sentiment repugnant to the spirit of true democracy is invoked to deaden real patriotism and to sacrifice every man who, in the trying hour, has dared to stand true to the rights of the American people.

An amazing spectacle is presented by what is being done in public affairs to-day. A few days ago the President sent in to Congress a message which rang like a bugle call, summoning the representatives of the American people to resist the aggressions of the British flag, and now we have presented in this House a bill for the perpetuation of a British standard that has destroyed more values and brought more destitution and misery than all the ravages of war. And yet we are asked to fight the one and to glorify the other, and to surrender to national banks one of the highest functions of National Government! And the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] has invoked the mighty spirit of Andrew Jackson to consecrate a surrender to British gold. Yesterday we passed a bill to bring about high prices in all protected industries, and to-day we are asked to pass a bill to perpetuate low prices in all industries not protected.

Mr. Speaker, the American people are watching the proceedings of this Congress. They are tired of being made the puppets of the miserable policies that are being pursued, and the time is coming when they will say so in terms and tones that can not be mistaken. Politicians are inventing makeshifts, but the people will marshal their mighty columns upon the line of living issues, and the conflict that will be fought to a finish is the battle of the standards. That is the mighty question that sooner or later will tower above all others, and I feel that I owe to my country and to my party to keep it before the people—

1. That the great issue now before the American people is the battle of the standards and not simply a question of circulation.

The question is, Shall we continue under the single gold standard, fraudulently foisted upon us by the Sherman Act of 1873, or shall we return to the bimetallic standard given us by the fathers of the Republic in 1792?

2. That bimetallism does not mean the concurrent circulation of the two metals, designated as the standard of value, but simply the free coinage of both on equal terms, so that the debtor shall have the right to pay his debt with either.

3. That, with this option upon the part of the debtor, if at any time the law-designated amount of one of these metals should be worth slightly less than the other, the option exercised by debtors to pay in the less valuable would increase the demand for that metal and decrease the demand for the other, and thereby constantly tend to bring and keep the value of the two upon a parity, at the ratio designated by law.

4. That the three important functions of money are first, as a medium of exchange; second, as a measure of value; third, as a standard of value or standard of deferred payments, and that in the present issue its most important function is that of a standard of value.

5. That the standard of value is that amount of precious metal, designated by law, either gold or silver, that the holder of every dollar of representative money is ultimately entitled to receive, and with which all deferred payments can be made and future or time contracts be performed, and have their present value estimated.

6. That silver was made a standard of value by the act of 1792, declaring that dollars of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, containing 371¼ grains of pure silver, should be the unit of value. It was that declaration of the law, and not the mere coinage or circulation of silver dollars, that made silver a standard of value. That provision of the act of 1792 remained in full force until the Sherman Act of 1873 made gold the sole standard of value by declaring that the gold dollar "at the standard weight of 25.8 grains shall be the unit of value."

7. That consequently the gold advocates, who argue upon the one hand that silver was really demonetized long prior to 1873, because the coinage and actual circulation of silver dollars had practically ceased, and on the other, that silver has not been demonetized at all, because more silver dollars have been coined since the act of 1873 than ever before, either do not understand what they assume to discuss, or else are trying to deceive the people as to the real issue involved.

If stopping the coinage or cessation from circulation of the unit of value could have the practical effect of overturning the standard of value set up by an act of Congress, what has become of the gold standard since the act of September, 1890, forbidding any further coinage of gold dollars and their virtual retirement from circulation?

8. That so far from bimetallism meaning the current circulation of the "unit of value" coins of both metals, it is not necessary that there should be an actual coinage of either of such units; and to show how entirely distinct is a question of circulation from that of a standard of value I have only to refer to Lord Hershell's report of the Indian currency committee of 1893, now before me, which points out that Scandinavia, Holland, and Canada have the gold standard, with little or no gold coin in circulation; that Canada and the Dutch East Indies have the gold standard, without even a mint or any gold coinage at all, and that Austria then had a gold standard, with mints closed against the private coinage of gold as well as silver, and a currency of inconvertible paper; and the West Indies a circulation based on gold, but consisting of token silver made legal tender to an unlimited amount.

9. That in order to estimate value, time, weight, or extension there must be a standard. Our standard of weight is the Troy pound of the mint. Our standard unit of all measures of extension is the yard, and is adjusted to the old bronze yard measure obtained from England in 1856, and kept at Washington. Our standard unit of dry measure is the Winchester bushel, containing 2150.42 cubic inches, and so on.

For all these things there has to be a standard, and with respect to all but money the idea of the standard is easily understood, as it simply measures the weight, extension, or capacity of things, but is not given or taken in exchange for what it measures. Money, however, is not only the measure, but also the equivalent of values, and is given and taken in exchange for what it measures. Among all civilized nations value is estimated by its price in money. Money is therefore a standard of value, and our law provides that the dollar shall be the unit of that standard.

10. That the standard of value is also the standard of deferred payments for all future or time contracts. To illustrate: As it is competent for an individual to say, "For this horse you now sell me I will pay you, one year hence, 50 bushels of wheat or 100 bushels of corn," so it is competent for the Government to say what shall constitute its "dollar," or standard of value, or deferred payments, so that all contracts for future payments shall be payable in so many grains of silver or so many grains of gold, designating the number of each to constitute a dollar or be the equivalent of its unit of value.

In the individual contract just referred to, one bushel of wheat was fixed on as equivalent to two of corn, or, in other words, the ratio was 2 to 1 as between the two things in which the deferred payment might be made. When payment became due, if it was easier to pay in 100 bushels of corn than 50 in wheat, the debtor would pay in corn, and if there was a large number of such contracts that would increase the demand for corn and tend to bring it upon a parity with wheat at the ratio of 2 to 1.

11. That the Sherman Act of 1873, having deprived silver of its function as a standard of value, the whole burden of the functions of primary money was thereby devolved on gold alone, thereby largely enhancing its purchasing power with respect to all commodities, including silver. This is clearly shown in the article entitled "Silver," in volume 22, Encyclopædia Britannica, page 81.

12. That at the very time that silver was degraded by being deprived of its function as a standard of value, the silver in a silver dollar was worth 3 cents more than the gold in a gold dollar.

It was demonetized then because it was too dear. It must be kept demonetized now because it is too cheap!

13. That so far from silver having decreased in value on account of its increased production and not from its demonetization, as claimed by the advocates of gold monometallism, carefully prepared tables of the world's production of gold and silver show that at no time in the history of the world has the output of silver as compared with gold been so small as it has been since 1852.

14. That from the discovery of America the output of the two metals was 31 per cent of gold to 69 per cent of silver.

That from 1801 to 1840 the output of silver to gold was more than $71 in silver to $28 in gold, and yet during all the time above referred to the principles of bimetallism kept them upon the average commercial ratio of less than 16 to 1.

That at present the comparative output is about $20 in silver to $15 in gold; so that it is perfectly evident that the widening in the difference of the commercial ratio between them has not been due to any increase in the output of silver.

15. That the old stock-in-trade argument that the movement in favor of the free coinage of silver is "in the interest of Western mine owners" is the same as if men interested in the unduly high price of bread were to denounce a movement to open the mills to corn as simply "in the interest of corn growers."

16. That from the earliest periods of history gold and silver have been money metals, just as wheat and corn are now food products, and closing the mints against the free coinage of silver depreciated its value and enhanced the value of gold just as naturally as it would decrease the price of corn and increase the price of wheat to close the mills against corn.

17. That with the mills open to both, and corn selling at 40 cents and wheat at 80 cents a bushel, if the mills were closed against corn its functions and value as bread material would be largely devolved on wheat, thereby lowering corn to about 20 cents and raising wheat to $1.

Such was the effect upon silver of the Sherman Act of 1873. It sent gold up and silver down.

18. That closing the mills against corn would not only injure every corn grower but every being that had been using cornmeal for food, and every such person would have to give more of his labor and more of his products in exchange for wheat, flour, or any form of bread. Closing the mints against silver has injured every man who exchanges his products or labor for gold or any form of money based upon gold.

19. Suppose it was proposed to repeal a wicked law that closed the mills against corn and made wheat the single standard or staple for food, what would be said of the men interested in keeping up the unnatural price of wheat who would fight the proposition for repeal and denounce it as simply a "measure in favor of corn growers"? They would simply be laughed to scorn or branded as extortioners and enemies of the people!

20. That with the mills open to both, the commercial ratio of corn and wheat would be 2 to 1. With the mills closed against corn, that ratio would be 5 to 1. Would it be just to say that before a law should be passed to open the mills to corn the Government should declare that so far as it was concerned and its influence could reach it should take five bushels of corn to equal one of wheat?

21. That, if opening the mills to corn would naturally lift it back to 40 cents and lower wheat to 80, and thereby restore the old ratio of 2 to 1, there is stronger reason for saying that reopening the mints to silver would restore it to the old ratio of 16 to 1, for no man in his sober senses would take 50 to 60 cents for silver which he could take to the mints and get 100 cents for by simply having it coined into a dollar.

22. That the argument so often advanced by the goldites that free coinage at 16 to 1 would make this country simply a "dumping ground for silver," and that we would have a perfect "deluge of silver," is utterly preposterous. The greatest part of the silver in the world, outside of the Unietd States, was coined at the ratio of 15½ ounces of silver to 1 in gold. Why would the owners of that silver pay the expense of shipping it here, having it melted and refined to our standard, and then give up 16 ounces of it to obtain what they could get for 15½ ounces in their own country? As to the danger of a "silver deluge," it is sufficient to say that the entire annual output of silver from the whole world, available for use as money, would barely suffice to pay the annual pension roll of the United States.

23. When goldites say that if we have free coinage our gold will leave us, ask them if it is not already doing that under the single gold standard, although we have paid a syndicate over $8,000,000 to watch over the Treasury for about six months and keep their friends from raiding it?

24. That when goldites say, if we have free coinage, bankers would buy up silver at 50 cents, and in that way pay off their depositors in "50-cent dollars," ask them where they would find the fool to sell them silver for 50 cents when he could get a dollar for it at the mints?

25. That when they say that at present the silver in a silver dollar is worth only 50 cents, ask them to tell you, if gold were demonetized like silver, what would be the bullion worth of the gold in that thin disk of yellow metal now called a "dollar"? With a supply of nearly four billions on hand, and an annual output of nearly twice the amount required for use in the arts, where would be the demand to make gold worth even 50 per cent of what it sells for now? Ask them also, if the silver in a silver dollar is only worth 50 cents, why do they propose to add to it 50 cents of fictitious value and make it equal to gold by mortgages upon the American people in the shape of Government bonds and the costly wages of a syndicate to act as watchmen for the Treasury?

26. When goldites argue that the single gold standard is already a fixed fact in our financial system, and that a change would injure "our business interests," tell them that no legitimate business should expect to prosper upon the sacrifice of the interests of the many to the few, and that the maintenance of the gold standard has already cost the American people many billions of dollars in reduced prices received for their exports and increase in their indebtedness.

27. When they talk about free coinage being simply "in the interest of mine owners," tell them that carefully prepared tables of the approximate annual losses caused by the decline in silver and the enhancement of gold show that such losses on cotton alone amount to $87,500,000, and on wheat alone, in sixteen States, to $68,050,000, aggregating on these two products $155,550,000, against $13,000,000 sustained by "Western mine owners."

28. When goldites point to Mexico and China as silver-standard countries, ask them what about gold-standard Egypt and Turkey and Liberia. Ask them also if it is not the standard of manhood and race and climate rather than the standard of value that makes the difference between all those countries and ours.

29. When they ask you if you want cheap dollars, tell them that any dollar is dear enough to you, and that a cheap dollar is simply one that you do not have to give up such a large amount of labor or products to get your hands on.

Tell them also that while silver dollars may be bulky, very few of us will need wheelbarrows to carry around what we get of them, and that a gold dollar is so little that it gets lost in a poor man's pocket, and its legs are too short to go around the corner to pay an honest debt, and it always runs and hides in time of need.

30. That as it is only the real or primary money whose free coinage is provided for by law that constitutes the "measure of values" by which is determined the price of labor and all its products, and as the amount of the precious metals in the whole world, available for use as money, is, in round numbers, $8,000,000,000, about equally divided between gold and silver, at 16 pounds of silver to 1 pound of gold, the natural effect of the demonetization of silver would be to lower the level of general prices about 50 per cent.

31. That gold being the standard and sole "unit of value," whatever increases the value of gold necessarily increases the value of 25.8 grains of gold, which constitutes the "unit of value," and whatever enhances the purchasing power of a gold dollar necessarily enhances the purchasing power of every dollar of representative money based on gold, or silver dollar artificially held up to gold by mortgages upon the people in the shape of Government bonds.

32. That it therefore follows that no plan that looks to an increase of circulation by means of State-bank or national-bank notes, or by an "enlarged use," or the "freest possible use" of silver, without restoring its ancient functions as standard money and a "unit of value," can be of any real and permanent benefit to the people.

If you want to benefit the people you must increase the volume of real money or broaden the base of your money of ultimate redemption, and that can only be done by the free coinage of silver or restoring its ancient function as a "unit of value."

33. That money is bought and sold the same as commodities, and its value or purchasing power is determined by the law of supply and demand, with the difference, however, that money, being the universal medium of exchange and standard of value, without which men can not procure what they want nor pay their debts, is always in a state of constant demand, such as nothing else is. Consequently, the smaller the supply of real or primary money in proportion to the amount of debts to be paid and labor and commodities to be exchanged for it, the greater becomes the purchasing power of every dollar and the lower the price of labor and of all commodities.

34. That business investments derive their profits from the prices obtained from their products or output, and that as dollars increase in value and products fall in price as dollars decrease in number, whatever diminishes the volume of real money or prevents it expanding to keep pace with the growth of the country and the demands of trade tends to stop investments and induce the hoarding of money and a plethora of it in the money centers to seek investment in Government bonds or stock gambling rather than in the channels of legitimate enterprises.

35. That with dollars constantly increasing in value, and other things decreasing, a man will not lend on or invest in land or a business plant, for fear that he will not be able to get his money back or realize on his investment. He would rather invest in Government bonds at a low rate of interest, or lock his money up and profit by its enhancing value than to take the risk of losing any part of his "fattening dollars."

36. That with not enough gold in the whole world to pay the interest on the amount of debts owed, and most of the great nations all grabbing for what there is, the value of gold is constantly enhancing, and therefore the single gold standard not only wrongs every debtor, but inflicts injury upon every productive enterprise and cuts down the demand for labor.

37. That earnings, not wages, are the test of the prosperity of labor, and that as earnings are wages multiplied by days of employment, plus number of those employed, there may be an increase in wages to those employed and yet a decrease in earnings on account of reduced hours and number of those employed, and such has been one of the results of gold monometallism.

38. That the same thing is true of the products of labor, the test of prosperous condition being the price obtained, multiplied by the amount of products sold.

A financial system, therefore, which forces a decrease in output or acreage in order to obtain an increase in price for articles of general necessity is both a blunder and a crime, and such is another one of the actual results of gold monometallism.

39. That there is no such thing as overproduction of cotton when millions of human beings are ragged for want of sufficient clothes; and there is no overproduction of grain when thousands are starving in sight of the elevators.

Let the farmers and producers have a reasonable profit upon all they can raise and produce, and there will be plenty of bread in the mouths of the hungry, and the ragged will have decent clothes.

40. That prior to the present Administration, no one ever heard of any real and prominent Democrats attempting to justify the Sherman Act of 1873, or bowing down to praise and glorify the single gold standard then set up, but many millions of honest Democrats have been denouncing it for years.

41. That when goldites talk about "ruinous inflation" and "panics" to result from free coinage, tell them that nature itself having imposed a limit to the output of gold and silver, there can be no such thing as an undue inflation from their coinage into real money, and that while panics may result from an undue inflation of bank notes or paper currency issued upon an insufficient metallic base, no one ever heard of a panic resulting from having too much real money of either silver or gold.

42. That when they say, on the other hand, that free coinage will cause a "ruinous contraction," by driving your gold out of circulation, tell them that your gold has already gone, and that the rest of the gold in this country is mostly locked up in vaults, and is practically out of circulation now, and that so far as free coinage causing gold to leave us under the operation of the "Gresham law" or the principle that "cheap money drives out dear money," tell them that so-called law simply amounts to this, that gold or silver—either one—like any commodity, will go where it can get the most for itself, and the gold we have now on hand we got here by paying more for it than anybody else would under the same circumstances. As gold goes where it can get the most for itself, it always gravitates to the level of lowest prices, and as "contraction" produces a fall in general prices, our goldite friends should explain the inconsistent idea of a "ruinous contraction" going on in this country and gold going out at the same time.

43. That Mr. Carlisle, in speaking of free coinage in his Memphis speech, said, "The immediate effect of such a policy would be a contraction to the extent of fully one-third of our present volume of currency by the expulsion of about $625,000,000 in gold," but in a few sentences afterwards he virtually contradicted that by saying, "The introduction into the currency of a country of any kind of money about which there is the least doubt will always operate to drive out the same amount or about the same amount of better money." This latter statement contradicts the first, but is nearer the real truth, and is based on the so-called "Gresham law," already referred to.

44. That the answer to the "Gresham law" sophistry is—

First. That as the opening of the mints to silver on equal terms with gold would naturally lift up silver and lower gold, the legal ratio would be established, and a gold dollar would not be any "better money" than a silver dollar, and the "Gresham law" would have nothing to work on.

Second. That granting the correctness of Mr. Carlisle's proposition that free coinage would not put silver and gold upon an exact parity, and that gold would be a little the "better money," still as the "cheaper money," silver, could only drive out about the same amount of gold, no contraction could take place.

45. That no gold dollar would leave without a silver dollar to take its place, and to whatever extent free coinage had lifted silver and lowered gold its purchasing power would fall, and general prices would rise, and the American people would get the benefit of it right here at home.

Not only this, but the very gold that went to Europe, leaving real money here to take its place, would increase the volume of real money there, and cause a rise in the very markets where our people have to sell their surplus cotton, wheat, and other products.

46. That when so-called "bimetallists" or "sound-money" men tell you that we can not have independent silver coinage at 16 to 1, that we must wait for other nations to join us, that we are not big enough to walk alone, tell them that for seventy years France virtually walked alone, and held gold and silver upon a parity at the ratio of 15½ to 1, and according to Mr. Carlisle himself, drew our silver to her standard. What was France, and all the aid she got from the so-called "Latin Union," compared to the mighty energies of this great Republic?

47. That in addition to all our vast volume of business and mighty productive energies we produce more silver than any other nation under the sun, and outside of Mexico and South and Central America we produce more than twice as much silver as all other nations of the earth combined. Why, then, should we expect any of them to join in, unless we shall take the lead, and raise the standard, and strike the first blow ourselves? Why should we stand halting and hesitating in the shadow of England, whose interests in this matter are diametrically opposed to ours? Her financial policy has controlled us too long already.

48. That whoever controls the purse will in the end control the sword.

That no nation can be entirely free that permits its financial policy to be controlled or dictated from without.

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."

Let us strike the blow for financial freedom.

Let us be true to the mighty spirit of the men who gave the bimetallic standard to our fathers in the morning of our history. They were as great in the councils of state as they were in the camps of war.

Let us not follow after that England whose haughty crest was laid low by Washington at Yorktown and by Jackson at New Orleans.

Let us be worthy of those grand old men who laid so deep and strong the foundations of the great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER. In Prescott's "Conquest of Peru," in speaking of the bounteous production of precious metals, he says (volume 1, pages 479, 480):

The effect of such a surfeit of precious metals was instantly felt on prices. The most ordinary articles were only to be had for exorbitant sums. * * * Every article rose in value as gold and silver, the representatives of all, declined. Gold and silver, in short, seemed to be the only things in Cuzco that were not wealth.

Now, on the contrary, it appears that any legislation we have had which decreased the money of ultimate redemption, has been followed by panics and the depreciation in value of all kinds of property.

THE PANIC OF 1857.

Prior to 1857, as is well known, nearly all the silver in circulation in the United States was in foreign coins, and a considerable amount of foreign gold coins were also in circulation. February 21, 1857, Congress enacted a law, section 3 of which is in these words:

That all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold or silver coins, and declaring the same a legal tender in payment for debts, are hereby repealed.

This very materially reduced the amount of money of ultimate redemption, and although at the date of the passage of the act the country was in a state of great prosperity, this contraction of the money of ultimate redemption soon caused the withdrawal of money from the channels of trade, because holders of money readily saw that money would increase in value, and there is no doubt that this law was, in a great measure, responsible for the fearful panic of 1857.

THE PANIC OF 1873.

When the war commenced the country was thrown upon a paper basis; but in 1873, while neither silver nor gold was in circulation, Congress enacted a law striking the silver dollar from the coins of our country, which was an announcement to the world that from that time the only money of ultimate redemption would be gold coin. We were then preparing to resume specie payments, and the moneyed people of the world realized that this act would largely reduce the money of ultimate redemption of the United States. This they knew would make money rise in value, or, what is the same thing, make property fall in value. The prudent and astute men, whether in this country or in Europe, immediately commenced withdrawing their money from the channels of trade, knowing, as they did, that at no distant day its purchasing power would be very largely increased; and this, of necessity, brought about a want of confidence in the value of nearly all kinds of property, and this was followed by what is called the panic of 1873.

Our gold-standard friends ask how it was possible for the demonetization of silver in February, 1873, to cause a panic during that year, when it is a historical fact that most of the members of Congress who voted for the bill, and President Grant, who signed the bill, were ignorant that its effect was to demonetize silver. My answer is, that while General Grant and many Senators and Representatives did not know that they were demonetizing silver, the moneyed men of the world did know it. It is a historical fact that the Rothschilds and the moneyed men of this country were largely instrumental in bringing about that enactment. They did it for the purpose of increasing the value of their money. They knew that would be the effect, and they immediately commenced to withdraw their money from the channels of commerce and kept it hoarded until they were enabled to buy stocks, bonds, and other property at panic prices.

Mr. Hooper, a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, on April 19, 1872, admitted that Mr. Ernst Seyd, who, it is charged, was sent to this country for the special purpose of securing legislation by which the United States would demonetize silver, furnished many valuable suggestions which were incorporated in the bill. His exact words were:

Mr. Ernst Seyd, of London, a distinguished writer, who has given great attention to mints and coinage, after examining the first draft of the bill, furnished many valuable suggestions, which have been incorporated in this bill.

DEMONETIZATION IN 1873 FRAUDULENTLY ACCOMPLISHED.

Judge Kelley, of Pennsylvania, who was chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, in 1872, said (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 7, part 2, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1605):

In connection with the charge that I advocated the bill which demonetized the standard silver dollar, I say that, though the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, I was as ignorant of the fact that it would demonetize the silver dollar, or of its dropping the silver dollar from our system of coins, as were those distinguished Senators, Messrs. Blaine and VOORHEES, who were then members of the House, and each of whom a few days since interrogated the other: "Did you know it was dropped when the bill passed?" "No," said Mr. Blaine, "did you?" "No," said Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think that there were three members in the House that knew it. I doubt whether Mr. Hooper, who, in my absence from the Committee on Coinage in attendance on the Committee on Ways and Means, managed the bill, knew it. I say this in justice to him.

Judge Holman on July 13, 1876, and again on August 5, 1876, especially asserted that he did not know the bill demonetized silver.

President Garfield, Mr. Blaine, Senator Thurman, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. Burchard of Illinois, Senator Bogy of Missouri, and many others who were members of that Congress made the same statement.

DISTRESS FOLLOWS DEMONETIZATION OF 1873.

The effect of this reduction of money of ultimate redemption caused great distress among the producing class and to our country. Everything fell fearfully in value. Cotton, which sold as high as 26⅜ cents in 1872, fell as low as 8¼ cents in 1878. This must have been caused by silver demonetization, as the increase in the crop had by no means kept pace with the world's need of cotton.

The crops for those six years were as follows:

Year.	Bales.
1872-73	3,930,508
1873-74	4,170,388
1874-75	3,832,991
1875-76	4,669,288
1876-77	4,485,423
1877-78	4,811,265

This great depression caused a universal demand throughout the country for the repeal of the iniquitous act of 1873 and the restoration of silver to the position contemplated by the Constitution.

Although silver coinage was most earnestly resisted by the moneyed men of New York and European centers, the act of 1878 was passed over President Arthur's veto by a two-thirds vote of both the House and Senate. This law provided for the coinage of at least 24,000,000 ounces of silver per year, giving us an annual increase of legal-tender money amounting to between forty and fifty million dollars. Almost immediately everything commenced rising in value. This is but natural, because the moneyed men of the world saw that the money of the United States was to rapidly increase, which would cause it to fall in value, or, which is the same thing, that property would rise in value.

GREAT PROSPERITY FOLLOWS COINAGE ACT OF 1878.

In order to show at a glance the marvelous decrease in the value of property caused by the demonetization of silver in 1873, and the phenomenal increase in the value by the partial remonetization of silver in 1878, I ask the attention of Congress to the following figures taken from the Financial Review of 1882, published under the shadows of Wall street, New York.

I place in the first column the selling price of the principal railroad stocks just prior to the demonetization of silver in February, 1873. In the second column I put the selling price of the same railroad stocks after the people had realized the baneful effects of the iniquitous act of 1873. I then put in a third column the selling price of the same stocks after the country began to feel the effect of the restoration of silver by the act of 1878.

These figures show that the demonetization of silver in 1873 caused the withdrawal of money from the markets and a fall in the value of all kinds of property. It shows that railroad stocks fell in many cases to a mere fraction of their value prior to 1873, and it also shows after the remonetization of silver in 1878 all property rose in a remarkable degree in value. It is no doubt true that the prices of these stocks were affected in some degree by other causes than the demonetization and remonetization of silver, but I insist that that was by far the most potent of all influences that bore upon them.

Other things besides stocks were affected in the same way. Wheat sold for $2.25 a bushel just prior to February, 1873, and after 1873 fell as low as 83 cents a bushel, and after the remonetization of silver it rose, selling as high as $1.59 a bushel.

We have seen that cotton was 26 cents just prior to demonetization, and that it fell to 8¼ cents after the demonetization, although the slight increase in the crops by no means was equal to the increased demand.

Now, after the remonetization of silver cotton rose to 12¼ cents in the face of the fact that crops increased from 4,800,000 bales in 1876–77 to 6,992,234 bales in 1882–83.

This is another proof of the detrimental effects of demonetization of silver and the energizing and beneficial effects of its remonetization. [Applause.]

LOW PRICE OF WHEAT CAUSED BY THE GOLD STANDARD.

I want to ask the members from the West who represent that numerous body of farmers who earn their living by raising wheat if they can attribute the present low price of wheat to anything but the gold standard?

I hold in my hand Clew's last financial circular. He quotes May wheat at 58 cents, when a year ago it was 60 cents. The visible supply of wheat was then 89,071,000 bushels, while to-day it is only 69,398,000 bushels. Now, with the visible supply 20,000,000 short, we see the price is 2 cents lower than it was a year ago. Let me tell the Western farmers that one great reason for the low price of wheat is that silver countries are usurping the market they once enjoyed.

India has increased her exports of wheat from nothing to 60,000,000 bushels; the Argentine Republic from nothing to many million bushels. Russia has increased her exports of wheat 100,000,000 bushels, and we have seen our exports of wheat fall from $210,000,000 down in one year as low as $42,000,000, and we have seen our exports of corn fall from $56,000,000 to $13,000,000. When the London merchant buys wheat from the United States he sends gold for it, and when he gets wheat from the silver countries he buys silver at 60 cents per ounce and sends it to silver countries, and when he pays 50 cents for wheat in India it only costs him about 25 cents in gold. That is one of the reasons why we are losing our market.

Mr. Bagehot, the editor of the London Economist, is the author of a work upon finance. Upon page 54 he said:

> The necessary effect of a depreciation of silver as against gold is to give a bounty on exports from India and the other silver-using countries to England. An English merchant can now buy many more rupees than he formerly could with the same number of sovereigns, and therefore he can import from India, though prices at Calcutta are not at a level at which it would have paid him to operate if he had not had that novel facility in getting rupees.

Nine years ago Mr. J. Shields Nicholson made the following statement to the royal commission on gold and silver:

> Now, it seems to me probable if the price of silver rose to its old level wheat could not be profitably exported from India until prices rose in a corresponding degree. For India, being a silver country, the price of wheat there is independent of the relative value of gold and silver. An exporter to England at present will give the Indian price in silver, and he can buy his silver for less gold, and thus competition will lower the price. If the price of silver rose the exporter from India must get more gold. Thus a rise of silver would, on this view, raise the price of wheat to a corresponding degree.

This was Mr. Nicholson's answer to the following direct question put to him by the chairman of the commission:

> Indian wheat is the very wheat that is complained of by Secretary Manning, Secretary of the United States Treasury, as having lowered the price of European and American wheat, and he attributes it all to the divergence of gold from silver. You do not think tying gold and silver again would raise the price of English and American wheat by 25 per cent?

Our distinguished Speaker understands this. Last year, in a speech, he said:

> It is evidently important for debtor nations, on which list we stand, first to raise the price of silver and thereby reduce that bounty on exports which Asia now enjoys.

I ask every man whose constituents are interested in wheat raising to give careful consideration to this expression.

GROUNDLESS ARGUMENTS OF GOLD-STANDARD MEN.

The gold-standard men try to make a strong argument out of the rise in the price of cotton during this year. This rise in the value of cotton was caused by the very small crop, the crop this year being estimated at only 60 per cent to 63 per cent of last year's crop. Such a decrease in the crop has a single precedent in this United States, and that was the decrease in the crop of 1865–66 below that of 1860–61. This caused an increase in price from 12 cents in 1861 to 44 cents in 1866, 32 cents in 1867, 25 cents in 1868, and 29 cents in 1869. Had it not been for the gold standard the great decrease in the crop this year would have caused cotton to rise to at least double its present price.

Some of the gold-standard people in a rather arrogant manner assert that the farmers and producing people of the country do not understand the money question and ought not to interfere with their management of the monetary legislation. I desire to say that the farmers and producing class understand this question just as well as it is understood by the bankers and money lenders. They know that when money is plentiful they receive good prices for their products and their families are comfortable and happy, and they also know that when there is a scarcity of money farm products are always low and they and their families are deprived of all the luxuries and many of the comforts and necessaries of life.

The first opportunity the people had to denounce the demonetization of silver of 1873 was in the election of November, 1874. In the fall of that year the Democrats went before the people promising them silver coinage, and upon that promise the Democrats in Congress were increased from 88 to 181. The first time the Democrats had an opportunity to express their views on this subject in a national platform was in 1876. They denounced the currency legislation of the Republican party and promised a thorough reformation on this subject, and upon that platform Mr. Tilden and a Democratic House of Representatives were elected. Pursuant to this promise of reform, the silver coinage law of 1878 was enacted.

In 1884 we elected Mr. Cleveland and a Democratic House of Representatives on a platform which said:

> We believe in honest money—the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution and a circulating medium converted into such medium without loss.

In 1892 we again went before the people with a platform which said:

> We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal.

This clause in the platform was emphasized in Mr. Cleveland's letter of acceptance, in which he said:

> The wants of the people arising from a deficiency or imperfect distribution of money circulation ought to be fully and honestly recognized and efficiently remedied.

The Democratic platform and Mr. Cleveland's letter were understood and explained by the public press throughout the United States to mean that silver should be coined on precisely the same terms as gold, and that there should be no discrimination against either metal. Upon this platform and pledge we elected a Democratic President, a Democratic House, and a Democratic Senate.

It is true that the platform declared that the metals must be of equal, intrinsic, and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as should insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals.

NO EXTREME LEGISLATION DEMANDED.

The people whom I represent do not demand any extreme legislation on this subject. They believe that gold and silver should be treated alike, in accordance with the pledge in the Democratic platform of 1892. Early in the session I introduced a bill which meets the requirements. If this bill should become the law, I believe it would go far toward relieving our country from the difficulties which now beset us.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase all pure silver bullion and all pure gold bullion which may be tendered to the Government, at a price not exceeding the average market price of said gold and silver bullion in the six leading markets of the world, said average price to be determined by the latest reports in the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue in payment of such purchases of silver and gold bullion Treasury notes of the United States, to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and of such denominations as he may deem most suitable for the use of the people; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such notes, when held by any national banking association, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined all of said gold and silver purchased under the provisions of this act, or so much thereof as it is possible to coin by using the fullest capacity of the mints of the United States. But it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to, as nearly as practicable, coin the same amount of dollars in silver as is coined in gold, and a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 4. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury in redeeming the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of this act to redeem them partly in gold and partly in legal tender silver, in that proportion in which the two metals were in the Treasury at the opening of business on the day on which the Treasury notes are presented.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

This bill is subject to but very few of the objections which have been raised against silver coinage, and certainly has many features which would commend it to all friends of the industrial classes. Besides, it would comply with the national Democratic platform's pledge for—the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either.

It would give the people a gradual, constant, and much-needed increase in the money of the country, and go very far toward restoring prosperity, and it would stop, or at least lessen, the constant demand on the Treasury for gold.

There is now about $70,000,000 of gold and 14,000,000 standard silver dollars in the Treasury available for redeeming coin obligations; therefore for every $100,000 of coin obligations presented for redemption to-day the holder would receive about $84,000 in gold and about $16,000 in silver. I believe this would stop the drain upon the Treasury, and that it would not in any way impair the credit of the Government. But if the Secretary of the Treasury should deem it unadvisable to inaugurate this system without notice and with the gold in the Treasury as it is at present it certainly would not impair the credit of the Government for the Secretary to now announce that such a plan would be pursued after the Treasury had been replenished by the $100,000,000 loan that we are informed is about to be effected. With that condition of the Treasury the holder of $100,000 coin obligations would receive about $92,000 in gold and $8,000 in silver.

Although the Republican party turned over the Government to the Democrats on March 3, 1893, in a bankrupt condition, the belief that the pledge of the party with regard to the silver coinage would be fulfilled was rapidly restoring confidence in all channels of trade.

THE MONEYED POWER CAUSED THE PANIC IN 1893.

Up to the 27th day of April, 1893, confidence in the financial situation and the beginning of a great prosperity seemed apparent. On that day the bankers and moneyed men of New York had a meeting and laid their plans to force Congress and the Administration to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, and thus prevent any increase in the amount of money in the country. These bankers determined to accomplish this purpose even if they had, as they expressed it, to pinch business throughout the country and cause a money crisis. They were so confident of their power that they felt they could accomplish their purpose, and immediately afterwards restore the country from the condition of panic to one of confidence. The account of this meeting is given in the New York papers of April 28 and May 1, and I have never seen any of these statements denied or even questioned.

The New York Sun of April 28, page 7, has an article headed "Bankers meet Carlisle." It says:

Secretary Carlisle decided yesterday morning to have a talk with the New York bankers.

The article then gives a list of the distinguished bank presidents who were present, and says:

The conference between the Secretary and bank presidents lasted somewhat over an hour.

The article then gives many details, and says:

The Secretary went over the currency laws of the country and stated they were in bad shape and needed revision.

The article then says:

President Cleveland's advisers have told him that the only way to induce the Western and Southwestern Senators and Congressmen to consent to the repeal of the Sherman law is to demonstrate to their constituents that they are losing money every day that this law is in operation.

I call special attention that the article does not say that President Cleveland is engaged in this work, but that his advisers have told him, etc.

This purpose was sought to be accomplished by repeated assertions, which were printed all over the United States, that the repeal of the Sherman law would immediately raise the price of cotton to 10 cents a pound and wheat to $1 a bushel.

The article then says:

The missionary work in that direction has been started by a number of the bankers in the solid communities of the East. They are daily refusing credits to the South, Southwest, and West.

The New York Sun of May 1 also has a letter from Washington, dated April 30. The letter reiterates the purpose to revise the currency laws, and says:

There is to be an extra session of Congress to afford the opportunity at as early a date as possible.

The letter also says:

Bankers will be expected to work, not in New York only, but throughout the country, doing their utmost to pinch business everywhere in the expectation of causing a money crisis that will affect Congress powerfully from every quarter.

This assertion on the part of the New York bankers that they intended to do their utmost to pinch business everywhere with the expectation of causing a money crisis, had its effect. The entire world saw that the money power of the United States was to be exerted in demonetizing silver, and that to accomplish this they were to immediately commence withdrawing money from the channels of trade. From that time a depression commenced which finally culminated in a panic, which aided very much in inducing Congress to permanently demonetize silver. Prices fell and distress pervaded our entire land.

While very many men for whom I have the highest respect take a different view, my study of this question has led me firmly to believe that there is a struggle between the great army of producers on one side and the small fraction of money lenders and capitalists on the other.

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.

What is our country? It is a great and free Republic of 70,000,000 people. It is estimated that of these, at least 35,000,000 men, women, and children are maintained by farm labor, most of them being actually engaged in manual work upon the farms where they reside, and these farms, containing in the aggregate some 600,000,000 acres, are spread over every part of the United States. When farmers are prosperous all other vocations enjoy prosperity. The manufacturer has a good market for his wares, the merchant collects his debts, and the educator, the minister, the lawyer, the physician, and the followers of all other vocations are well paid. It is for the farmer, who is the creator of nearly all the wealth of the land, that I appeal.

THE PEOPLE'S EMPHATIC DENUNCIATION OF THE GOLD STANDARD.

To show that the people did not approve of this demonetization of silver in 1893, I will give the result of the elections in 1892, 1893, and 1894. Bear in mind that in 1892 the Democratic party voted for a candidate and platform which pledged them to "the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either." The election of November, 1893, was had just after the demonetizing act of November 1, 1893.

The advocates of high tariff can not say that the election of November, 1893, was at all affected by any tariff legislation, because no tariff legislation had been had, and no bill had even been reported from a committee of Congress.

In November, 1892, the Democrats carried New York by 45,518 under a platform pledging silver coinage. In November, 1893, after the failure of the Democrats to redeem that pledge, the Republicans carried New York by a vote ranging from 19,924 to 101,064, and in 1894 the Democrats went before the people in New York State with a gold-standard platform and a gold-standard candidate and were defeated by 156,105 votes. In 1892 the vote in Ohio between Cleveland and Harrison was about even. In 1893, just after the Democrats had failed to carry out their pledge regarding coinage, that party was defeated by 80,995 votes, and in 1894 the Democrats of that State went before the people with a gold-standard candidate and a gold-standard platform and were defeated by 137,087.

In Massachusetts the Democrats elected a Democratic governor in 1891 by 6,467 votes, and in November, 1893, a Republican governor was elected by 35,697, and in 1894 this Republican majority was increased to 65,377.

In Illinois, upon a coinage platform, the Democratic majority in 1892 was 26,993. In 1894 this was changed into a Republican plurality of 123,427.

I ought probably to have used the word plurality instead of majority throughout, but this makes no material difference in the argument.

New Jersey and other States which had been considered reliably Democratic went into the canvass in 1894 with a gold-standard platform and a gold-standard candidate, and were all overwhelmingly defeated. Even Maryland, which gave a majority of 21,130 for Cleveland in 1892, went before the people with gold-standard platform and candidates, and the State went Republican by 2,686. At the same election Mississippi declared herself for the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution and went overwhelmingly Democratic. It seems to me that these elections are a sufficiently emphatic expression by the people of their views regarding this question which so materially affects their interests.

PRIOR TO 1890 SILVER COINAGE WAS A CARDINAL DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINE.

Up to 1890, for a Democrat who represented any constituency except moneyed men and bankers to vote against silver coinage was regarded as the most unjustifiable betrayal of the cause he had sworn to defend. On June 5, 1890, 13 Democrats, representing constituencies of the Northeast, which included banking and moneyed men, made bold to vote with the Republicans against silver coinage; but, notwithstanding the efforts of their banking friends, the people rose in their might and swept them from public life. Every reason which made silver coinage imperative for the welfare of the people prior to 1890 exists to-day.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LACEY). The gentleman has fourteen minutes remaining.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield that time to my colleague, Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself and my constituents, I feel it my duty to enter my protest against the passage of the bill now under consideration. The bill has been reported to this House by the members of the committee who represent the majority on this floor without first having been introduced in the usual and regular way. It is proposed to pass it to-morrow afternoon, with only a few hours' debate and under a rule that prohibits any amendments being offered.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, few measures have come before the House the effects of which are more far-reaching in their consequences and which, in my humble judgment, would prove more disastrous to the business, commercial, and agricultural interests of this country than those embodied in this bill.

The object of the bill—I mean the real object, not that which appears on the face of the bill—is to retire from circulation $346,681,016 of United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and $146,088,400 of Treasury notes of 1890, amounting to a contraction of the currency of the country to the extent of $492,769,416. According to the statement of the Treasury Department, the total amount of money in circulation on June 30, 1895, amounted to $1,602,182,725. It is readily seen what an enormous contraction will take place if the greenbacks and Treasury notes are retired under the provisions of this act.

I know it is contended that this bill is merely a bill "to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiency of revenue." The first section of the bill provides for an issue of United States bonds, to an indefinite amount, for the purpose of redeeming greenbacks and Treasury notes when presented for redemption. And this section provides—

That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes."

The second section authorizes the issue of bonds in small denominations not to exceed $50,000,000 in amount, to provide for any temporary deficiency now existing or which may hereafter occur.

But let us consider the effect of the bill, if actually put in operation. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, says there is no deficiency in the Treasury. The daily statement of the condition of the Treasury shows an available cash balance of $109,183,928 exclusive of the gold reserve.

Yesterday a tariff bill was passed through this House by the Republican majority for the purpose, so it was stated, of supplying a deficiency in our revenues, and we are told that under the provisions of this bill the revenues received for a tax on goods imported into this country will increase the revenues of the Government $40,000,000, a sum largely in excess of the alleged deficiency.

Why are we then asked to authorize the issue of bonds to meet temporary deficiencies in the revenue?

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his remarks threw a side light on the effect of the bill that explains the real object to be accomplished by its passage. In referring to the section of the bill that provides for the issue of bonds to meet temporary deficiencies in the revenue, he says:

Our object in so limiting their use is to separate as far as possible in the accounts the cash in the Treasury available for current expenses and the reserve that is retained for redemption purposes.

Again he says:

A reserve is a distinct thing, and it is of the utmost importance that it should be maintained without any attempt to divert it to other purposes, and the most important part of this legislation, I want to say to my friends on this side of the House, lies in the fact that if this bill shall pass it will compel the separation of the accounts, and the reserve will and must be treated as a reserve, not to be trenched upon to meet current deficiencies of revenues. And when there is any necessity to have money to meet a deficiency of revenue, then the resort must be had to another source to supply that deficiency of revenue.

This comes from the author of the bill, and it is but fair to presume that it is a correct interpretation of the results that will follow from its passage. With an available cash balance in the Treasury of over $100,000,000, with a tariff law which they say will increase the revenues $40,000,000 a year, and authority given to issue $50,000,000 in bonds to meet temporary deficiencies in revenue, with the general account and the redemption account kept separately, so that resort must be had to other sources than the redemption account to supply deficiencies in revenue; when these Treasury notes and greenbacks are once presented for redemption, how will it be possible for the Government to pay them out again so they may once more become a part of the money in actual circulation in the country? Under the provision of this bill the greenbacks and Treasury notes presented to the Treasury of the United States for redemption, will be locked up in the vaults of the Government, and though they are not actually burned up or destroyed, they will no longer be available for the people of the country to use in the transaction of their business and we will have a virtual contraction of the currency amounting to nearly half a billion dollars.

On the 12th of February, 1873, an act was passed revising and amending the laws relative to the Mint, assay offices, and coinage of the United States. This act, apparently a good law on its face, carried concealed in its folds the words that demonetized silver and deprived the people of this nation of the privilege of carrying their silver bullion to the mints and having it coined into money.

The present bill, Mr. Speaker, although from the title its real purpose may not appear, in many respects will be as disastrous to the masses of the people of this country as that enacted on the 12th day of February, 1873.

Should this bill become a law it will require not only the action of this House but the action of the Senate of the United States and the concurrence of the President of the United States to get the greenbacks and Treasury notes back into the hands of the people.

If we are to be guided in any degree by the history of the past we find many monuments there to guard and warn us against the policy of contraction.

In 1723 the Bank of England suspended, and great financial distress resulted to the people. The gold and silver coin of the American colonies was needed and England called it home to prepare the bank for redemption. England wanted our money and took it. There was no money left for the people of the colonies to transact their business with, and great financial distress, want, and bankruptcy followed.

Benjamin Franklin, the great philosopher and statesman, describing the result of this crisis, on page 185 of his autobiography, said:

I remember well that when I first walked about the streets of Philadelphia, eating my roll, I saw most of the houses of Walnut street, between Second and Front streets, with bills on their doors—to let, and many likewise on Chestnut street, which made me think the inhabitants of the city were deserting it one after another. Our junta debates possessed me so fully of the subject that I wrote and printed an anonymous pamphlet on "The nature and necessity of a paper currency." It was well received by the common people in general; but the rich men disliked it, for it increased as well as strengthened the clamor for more money, and they happened to have no writer among them that was able to answer it. Their opposition slackened, and the point was carried by a majority in the house. The utility of this currency became, by experience, so evident as never to be much disputed; so it grew soon to be £55,000, and in 1779 to £80,000, since which it rose to £350,000, trade, buildings, and inhabitants all the while increasing.

He ascribed as a chief cause of their prosperity after the issue of this money the fact that there was sufficient circulating medium to meet the wants of business and the needs of the people.

Since the time of Queen Elizabeth the dominating idea in the mind of every Englishman has been to control the commerce and own the money of the world.

After the Bank of England had resumed specie payments and they had a surplus of gold they began to look around for someone to borrow the money and pay them interest until they wanted it again. They came with it to America for that purpose, but found the American Colonies had a money of their own that supplied all their needs and no longer needed British gold. Then the English Parliament, in 1773, in order to create a vacuum into which their surplus gold could flow, enacted a law depriving the American paper money of its legal-tender qualities, and in 1775 declared it void.

This contraction of the circulating medium paralyzed all the industrial energies of our people. Ruin seized upon this once prosperous and happy people, want and suffering went into nearly every home, business languished and commerce ceased, discontent was urged to desperation, until at last "humanity arose and asserted its rights." Our forefathers declared their independence and threw off the British yoke.

Again, in 1837, a contraction took place. In 1833, 1834, 1835, and 1836 eight hundred State banks were supplying the people of the United States with money to engage in all kinds of speculation. The banks of Great Britain were doing the same for the people of England. On May 10, 1837, all the New York banks suspended specie payment. The President of the United States issued the "specie circular" demanding that the public lands be paid for in specie only. The banks failed, banking currency became worthless, and currency contraction took place. What money was left went into hiding, and the panic of 1837 resulted, with all its terrible consequences to the people of this country.

In a speech delivered in New York City in March, 1837, that peerless statesman and profound logician, Daniel Webster, ascribed the distress to the interference of the Government with the currency. At that meeting an address was prepared to the President which said:

The value of our real estate has within the last six months depreciated more than $40,000,000; within the last two months there have been more than 250 failures. A decline of $20,000,000 has occurred in our local stocks. The immense amount of merchandise in our warehouses within the same period has fallen in value at least 30 per cent, and within a few weeks not less than 20,000 individuals depending on their labor for their daily bread have been discharged by their employers because the means of retaining them were exhausted.

It takes but a few words to give the history of all these panics; contraction of the currency from one cause or another; business paralyzed; want, poverty, and distress the necessary result.

Prior to the 21st day of February, 1857, we had a large amount of foreign coin in circulation in this country, variously estimated at from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. This coin was made a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private. Up to that time and to all intents and purposes it was our own money. On the day last mentioned a law was passed depriving this foreign coin of its legal-tender powers, and as a consequence struck it down as money and contracted the currency to that extent. In this same year $7,000,000 of American securities were sold by English holders in New York and the gold taken to England to help the Bank of England maintain specie payments. Our home banks drew $20,000,000 of gold out of the Treasury and the Government had to issue paper money. This panic caused the failure of five or six thousand business men; there is no telling how many men it threw out of employment, nor how many millions of dollars it cost the people of the United States.

On the 12th day of April, 1866, an act was passed contracting the currency by the retirement of the legal-tender notes. Under this law $1,300,000,000 of actual currency was destroyed and converted into bonds, and on the 12th day of February, 1873, the act was passed demonetizing silver, and the panic of that year followed, in my judgment largely caused by the enormous contraction of the currency. It is unnecessary for me to go into the details of the direful results of this panic, which were far-reaching, and the personal distress and the business failures resulting must ever stand as a black page in the history of this great nation.

These are facts gleaned from the pages of our own financial history, that show that as surely as the night shall follow the day a serious contraction of the currency of any country will be followed by financial distress and disaster. This is not only true of our nation and our people, but it is true of all nations and all people.

And yet the gentlemen who have introduced this bill, who wish to drive it through this House without amendment and with but little opportunity for discussion, tell us that a great crisis is at hand and if relief is not given at once our boats will be driven upon the shores of bankruptcy and ruin.

The relief they propose is to pass a bill that will contract our currency nearly one-third of the amount now in circulation. In the light of the past, can we expect relief in the future by means of a remedy that has always proven disastrous heretofore? I think not. Mr. Speaker, the time for temporary expedients has passed. The gold reserve no more affects, as a matter of fact, the solvency of our bills payable than a drop of water affects the depth of the ocean. It is only dangerous in that it is being used to frighten the country. I am not in favor of maintaining it at all. It should be wiped out entirely. The Government of the United States should be taken out of the banking business, and we should at no time attempt to redeem, as a nation, one class of our money with another. Whenever we do so we discriminate against the solvency of one dollar in favor of the solvency of the other. But, Mr. Speaker, to accomplish that result I can never consent to strike down one-third of the money of the country without substituting some other money in its place. Such relief would be purchased at too dear a price, and, furthermore, it is not necessary. The bill prepared by the Democrats of this House as an amendment, which the majority have refused to allow us to introduce, provided for the substitution of silver dollars coined out of silver already belonging to the Government and in the Treasury for the Treasury notes. In this way the gold reserve can be abolished without contracting the currency one dollar, and the masses of the people will no longer be compelled to pay enormous taxes to provide free gold, not only to our own people, but the people of all countries, especially when the Governments of Europe keep their gold under lock and key and only allow it to be drawn on when they determine it is wise or expedient to do so.

We have no more money in circulation in this country than the necessities of trade require. A contraction of the currency, instead of relieving the present crisis, would in all probability produce another panic more destructive to our business interests than that through which we passed two years ago.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I give my hearty support to this bill because I believe it is for the best interests of my country and that it is also in accord with the pledges made by the party of which I have the honor to be an humble member. Four years ago this great country of ours was prosperous. Four years ago our country seemed to enjoy unlimited credit and to have the unbounded confidence not only of the people of the United States, but those of every other civilized nation. We had the ability then to pay every debt that was incurred for the expenses of the Government, because its revenues were sufficient to meet such expenses.

There was then no question as to the redemption of the legal-tender note or of the note known as the Treasury note. Both forms of currency were held by the people; and very few of those notes were ever presented for redemption, because there was general confidence throughout the whole country. But there came the election of 1892; and upon that November morning when the people of the country awakened to the fact that the Presidency had been given to the Democratic candidate, that the Senate would be Democratic, and that the House of Representatives would be in accord with the Senate—that, in other words, the legislative power and the executive power were to be in the hands of a party that entered upon the possession of the Government with the avowed purpose of striking down that great system of American protection to which the Republican party has been pledged and under the banner of which the Republican party had won its victories—the people of the United States, whose course had been onward and upward on the great highway of success for over thirty years, finding after the election that this party with its purpose thus avowed was coming into power and that instead of this American system of protection it was about to introduce another system entirely at variance with it—a system which would turn the channels of trade, which would interfere with every species of business—when that was ascertained there arose something that comes whenever you have a great transformation in a country; there came the alarm of a people. Following that alarm came distrust, and in the wake of distrust there came want of confidence; and after that the cessation of credit. And when credit was wanting then the business interests of the country were almost at a standstill.

That being the condition of the business of the country, what resulted to the Government of the United States? There resulted a decrease of revenue. From the time that election took place and when that want of confidence arose, when the business of the country began to languish, when it was either at a standstill or very materially crippled, the internal revenue of the Government was decreased and the impost duties fell away. Thus we find that the revenue of the country was cut off. What was the result? Though we were in a time of peace, though there were no extraordinary expenditures, yet the very ordinary expenditures of the Government could not be paid from its revenues.

What next occurred? What occurs to an individual who lives beyond his means? He must do one of three things: Either he must accumulate about him a great mass of floating debt, or he must use some trust fund, which, perchance, may be in his hands, to make good his own deficiency, or, Micawber like, he must go out and issue his "I O U's" and "wait for something to turn up." So it was with this nation of ours. The moment its revenues became insufficient to pay the current expenses the nation was living beyond its means. The moment it was in that condition it became a debtor; and when it became a debtor and the Democratic party came into power, the first thing the Administration did was to touch a sacred fund that had been set aside for a special purpose.

This fund was not intended to pay the expenses of Government; it was a sacred gold reserve fund which had been placed in the Treasury by the Republican party for the redemption of the legal-tender and Treasury notes. That party had said that the limit of that fund which could not be encroached without danger was $100,000,000. But when the Democratic party came into power, having present needs pressing upon them, they resorted to the use of that fund. Having been above one hundred millions it was in the first months of that Administration rapidly dissipated. It fell to $100,000,000, and after that line was passed it decreased to ninety millions, to eighty millions, to seventy millions, to sixty millions, almost to fifty millions. What was that? It was a transgression of which a nation should never have been guilty.

At that very moment, Mr. Speaker, the Administration should have called a halt and something should have been done other than the taking of that fund. They did something more than that. They not only used during that period this sacred fund for the redemption of the legal-tender notes, but they did that which caused a lack of confidence on the part of our own people, as well as a lack of confidence on the part of Europe, from whom we had borrowed money. They said, "Here is a debtor who lives beyond his means and who uses a sacred trust fund on the first occasion presented, a fund which is set aside for the redemption of his obligation, and is using it for present purposes."

This condition of affairs caused a lack of confidence, and then for the first time the greenback began to be presented for redemption. It was not originally presented for redemption. That fund was not encroached upon by the redemption of the greenbacks in the first instance. It was used to pay the expenses of the Government, and when this was done confidence was lost, and then the outstanding obligations of the Government began to be presented for liquidation. This went on day by day and week by week, and thus the history of each month presented itself. Again and again the greenbacks were presented and the Administration found it must do something to replenish the Treasury. Then they issued the bonds, which were first taken by our own people; and later, under cover of the night, the Administration made a contract with a foreign syndicate, and they placed more of the Government bonds. So it was that this transaction originated. And as we look it over now, as we take the sheets of the Treasury now and see the reports of its condition from day to day, we find that notwithstanding the Democratic party, through its Administration, has added $162,000,000 to the bonded debt of the United States, still this sacred fund has been repeatedly encroached upon and is again below the mark almost $40,000,000.

Now, again, the appeal comes that something must be done to remedy the situation. The President of the United States finds himself unable to control the situation and appeals to Congress, and says they should take cognizance of the matter and do something to remedy the existing condition of things. I favor, then, the passage of these bills.

We must do three things to remedy the situation. In the first place, we must see that there is enough revenue furnished to take care of the present expenses of the Government, because, so long as you have not revenue enough to meet present expenses, all the bonds which you may issue will not keep up that sacred reserve fund. But by the passage of the bill on Thursday I believe we will accomplish that result. I believe we will provide sufficient revenue. That bill was not such a bill as I, as a Republican protectionist, living in a border State, was willing to vote for had it not been that I knew it to be a revenue measure only, and necessary for this temporary purpose. I think the first duty of Congress—the first duty it owes to the people of the United States—is to protect the credit of the country; and so, Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding in this protection now. First, the bill was necessary to furnish revenue. In the second place, we must do something to make good that sacred coin gold reserve fund held for the redemption of the legal tenders and Treasury notes. This will be done by the pending bill, which authorizes the issuance of coin bonds, which shall be used in such amounts as are necessary for the redemption of the legal tenders.

It has been urged to-day in the course of this discussion that the legal tenders will be redeemed and that they will never come out to the people again, and for that reason that there will be a contraction of the currency to that extent. Just so long as there is a demand for the gold on the legal tenders they are in excess of the demand for them among the people. The moment they find in power a party that intends to protect the credit of the country, that intends to carry out the pledges to this country, that every dollar shall be as good as every other dollar, and that dollar shall be the highest dollar known to the world, just so long as they find a party to make that pledge good, you will find that the greenbacks will not be presented for redemption. It will be retained in circulation, because outside of the gold currency of the country the greenback is the best currency we have to-day.

Another thing. The $138,000,000 of notes issued under the Sherman Act are the currency of the country. They are issued upon the bullion in the Treasury of the United States that was purchased by the Government. Suppose these are presented and redeemed by the proceeds received from the sale of bonds? The effect would be the retirement of $138,000,000 of these notes, and I think it better to retire them than to retire the legal-tender notes.

Retire them, say, for instance. When you do that you free this $138,000,000 of silver in the Treasury of the United States, and Congress can then pass a law which will coin this silver into subsidiary coin and send it out to the people of the United States for use. We need subsidiary silver coin, and I want to say right here as a Republican that I believe that the silver thus made free should be coined in this manner, not into the 16 to 1 dollar, because I am opposed to that; but we can issue it in the shape of subsidiary silver. I believe that these are some of the benefits that can be accomplished by this bill. More will follow in the future. But this is the first step in the right direction. The great thing that we must establish, that we must build up, that we must maintain in the country is confidence in our purpose to do that which is right.

The Republican party has always been able to rise to the situation. Time was when there was an assault made on the lines of this party, when it was contended that an unlimited amount of greenbacks should be sent to the country, to pay the bonded obligations of the country. Then it was that a Republican President stood up between that idea and the Republican policy; and, thanks be to God and to Ulysses S. Grant, the party was saved that defeat. We rose to the height of the occasion, and we protected the credit of the country. I appeal to my party to-day, that we rise to the height of this occasion, and while it may be a Democratic President who makes this appeal, he is the President of the United States and we as Republicans owe it to our party and to our people to protect the credit of our country now and at all times. It is our first duty. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, we desire to enter our protest against the passage of this legislation. The States of the Northwest have always been loyal to the Republican party, and their representatives have been faithful supporters of the doctrine of protection. We believe in that doctrine as implicitly as do our Eastern friends, and we stand ready to cooperate with them in the passage of legislation for the purpose of raising revenue sufficient to pay the expenditures of the Government and for the protection of American interests. We will go to any reasonable length in that direction and are willing to abide by the decisions of our party on that question. We have always occupied this position. My constituency ask protection and need it as much as do the people of Pennsylvania or Massachusetts. While we are producers of so-called raw material, we recognize the fact that its production necessitates compensatory duties on imports of the manufactured product therefrom in order that the manufacturer of the East may have adequate protection. Realizing this and appreciating it in all its significance, and standing ready to hold up the hands of our Eastern brethren along these lines, even to the extent of the McKinley schedules, nevertheless, we must enter our earnest protest against the passage of a measure like that now before the House.

From the date of its birth the Republican party has been a party of protection; this principle has been one of its cardinal virtues; this has been proclaimed in its success and asserted in its defeat. It has not wavered when that principle was up for consideration; it has not faltered along these lines, and its triumphant success, again and again, has been due to its advocacy of this idea. Because the American people believe in a continuation of that principle we support it; but the American people have never proclaimed in time of peace the interest-bearing bond theory; that idea has never been sired by any political organization. The President of the United States and the bankers of New York alone have demanded it. The Democratic party and the Republican party each have again and again repudiated it.

Our friends on this side of the Chamber who propose this legislation insist that the Republican party must come to the rescue of the Government. We of the West believe there is another way of doing this without issuing bonds. We believe that under the law, under the plain letter and spirit of the written statutes, a remedy fully and completely presents itself to the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as maintaining the gold reserve is concerned. We believe he should pay with the kind of money which the law prescribes, gold and silver. This law has always been upon the statute books, and is so plain of interpretation that no man can misunderstand it. His failure to do that has brought about the condition of this endless chain which makes it impossible for the Government to maintain the gold reserve.

The committee now presents a measure for the relief of the situation which has never been approved by any political organization and is not now sired by any party; it is without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity; it is the monstrous proposition of retiring the greenbacks and Treasury notes by an issue of interest-bearing bonds. This is unquestionably the practical effect of it, because the bill provides that the proceeds of the bonds shall be used for the redemption of legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose. The situation is, therefore, simplified and narrowed down to the plain proposition to retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes with an issue of bonds in time of profound peace; in other words, a contraction of the currency to the extent of almost $500,000,000 when the country is sorely in need of more money. Our people do not believe in bond issues of any kind at this time, but look upon a measure of this kind as fraught with more evil in its consequences than any deficit which can confront us.

We believe that no permanent prosperity can come to this country until this problem is solved by the free coinage of silver. It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the merits of this plan now. The President says that this plan is an unsupported and improbable theory and contrary to the practice of other nations and the teachings of the wisest statesmen and economists of the world, both past and present, and that it runs counter to our own actual experience. He and the other advocates of a gold standard insist that we can not maintain the parity of the two metals by free coinage, and cites as a reason therefor the disparity which now exists. For two hundred years prior to 1873 the commercial ratio between gold and silver ranged between 14 to 1 and 16 to 1. During that time silver in most commercial countries enjoyed the same coinage privileges accorded to gold. During the last sixty years of that time Great Britain, the greatest commercial nation in the world, destroyed the use of silver as money; nevertheless, the parity was maintained until the United States joined hands with Germany and the States of the Latin Union in striking down the white metal. Then, and not till then, was the parity destroyed. The price of silver, like gold and every other product of human industry, was regulated by the law of supply and demand. Half of the demand which the world has had for silver as well as gold has been created by the money function which the world has given it. The great civilized nations of the earth, which by legislation had created half of this demand, destroyed it by antagonistic legislation, and then the advocates of a single gold standard criticised silver for its failure to maintain its ratio. This criticism is unfair, illogical, and unjust. Had gold been treated in the same way it would be in as bad if not worse plight than silver is to-day. The President insists that our credit would be ruined if we adopted a free-coinage law, and in support of his position he cites the low price of silver as compared with gold. Any legislation short of free coinage must treat silver simply as a commodity; it occupies that position to-day in the financial affairs of our country; it is simply a material out of which money is made, but is not fundamental money in any sense of the word. We believe in a metallic basis for money; we believe that every dollar issued by the United States should be either itself made out of gold or silver or be redeemable in gold or silver. Silver to-day occupies the same position with respect to gold as does the paper currency, both measured by the gold standard.

Many so-called bimetallists pretend to favor the unrestricted coinage of both metals, but insist that this country can not do it alone, and that the great powers of Europe, particularly Great Britain, must consent by international agreement before we can safely resume the free coinage of silver. These pretended friends of silver have done it an infinite deal of harm in the past; they pretend to be its friends, while always failing to do anything practical to assist it. The President and other single-standard advocates attempt to sustain their position by referring to the fact that the ratio between the two metals in the United States has not been uniform since the establishment of our Government until 1873. There is nothing in this contention.

In 1792 Mr. Hamilton induced Congress to adopt the ratio of 15 to 1, and coinage on that schedule was adopted. However, there was very little of either gold or silver coined under this ratio, the Government coining less than two millions in gold and about a million and a half in silver. In 1803 France began the free coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 15½ to 1. This naturally made gold more valuable than silver and had a tendency to attract the yellow metal to France, and our currency, as a result, became chiefly silver. This was not entirely the case, but the premium of 3 per cent incident to the new ratio established by the French mint had a tendency and did largely attract gold to that country. In 1834 this Government adopted the present ratio of 15.988 to 1. The adoption of this ratio caused gold to depreciate about 3 per cent. As a result silver, to a great extent, retired from circulation in this country.

The commercial ratio between the two metals had nothing to do with this partial drawing apart, but it was the mint ratio fixed by the laws of two great money-using countries which affected this result; in other words, the demand was created for one or the other of these money metals as the legislation of one or the other of these great countries changed the ratio. During all of the period between 1816 and 1873 England did not recognize silver as money of ultimate redemption, but treated it solely as a commodity. It must be apparent to even the advocates of a single standard that the French law controlled the commercial ratio of gold and silver during all of this period, for France was then the greatest commercial nation which fixed this ratio by legislation. The friends of silver insist that, judging from this precedent, our country, the greatest consuming and producing nation on the face of the earth, can do the same thing. But the limited time given for the discussion of this measure will not permit of going into the great principles which underlie the free coinage of gold and silver on this occasion.

We believe that the Republican party can enact tariff legislation which will put this country on a cash basis. The only argument that has ever been advanced by members on this side of the House in support of this measure is that the President would not sign a tariff bill pure and simple, but might possibly sign one which had connected with it, in the way of contemporaneous legislation, a bond scheme. This so-called argument is absolutely no argument whatever and is unworthy the utterance of any member on this floor. It is not even entitled to the respect of an argument for its expediency. I am not much given to expediency in matters of legislation; but placing the cause of this bill on that ground alone (and that is the only virtue which can be claimed for it), it certainly has no merit.

It is a well-known fact that there is a substantial bimetallic majority at the other end of the Capitol and that this majority stands ready and willing to enact legislation in the interests of the cause of silver when the occasion presents itself. It is also a well-known fact to every member of this House who has cared to inform himself on the subject that the Senate will not permit a bond bill to pass. If this reaches the Senate in its present form a free-coinage bill will be substituted in lieu thereof. That will be the substitute which will come back to this House, and on that proposition the Senate will unquestionably stand. It therefore is absolutely impossible for the bill—this bill of expediency, promulgated by men who, in advance of the necessity for it, have proclaimed compromise—to ever reach the President of the United States, much less receive his signature. The argument of expediency, therefore, falls to the ground.

This legislation had its origin in the alarm of the President of the United States. What caused this alarm? The people are not afraid. There has been no cry of terror gone up from the mass of the people throughout the length and breadth of the land. We have not heard the voice of fear in the great city of Chicago or anywhere in the great Mississippi Valley, the granary of the world; it does not come from the mountains of the West. Whence has it come? From the interest gatherers and money changers of a single street in the city of New York, the direct lineal descendants of those whom Christ ejected from the temple. They are without a country and a nationality; they owe no allegiance to anything but gold; they are absolutely without courage and without patriotism; they bow down humbly to any kind of a yoke and would cheerfully permit any insult to their country and subject themselves to any kind of indignity so that they may have a continued opportunity to gather in their unearned profits.

They write us that already the stock exchange has witnessed a loss of $500,000,000 as a result of the action of the President and the Congress of the United States on the Venezuelan question. It is not true, but if it were true it is not a matter that would concern the American people. Those millions do not represent real values. They represent a fluctuation in values which was the direct result of speculation—gambling, if you are pleased to call it by its right name. These people are not even entitled to be dignified by the name of gamblers; they do not possess the courage of gamblers. A gambler will risk his all on the cast of a die or the turn of a card, and smile complacently when he sees it lose; but those stock gamblers whine and cringe like whipped curs when they lose a small percentage of that which they have dishonestly wrung from the people. If I read history aright these people have never come to the rescue when the interests of the Government were at stake; they have always faltered in the rear; their sympathies have always been foreign: they have not upheld the flag of their country by their money or by their strength. It was this same cry that Abraham Lincoln had to contend with during the war of the rebellion. The cause of secession received more aid and comfort in the city of New York than it did from the State of South Carolina. Many of the brave soldiers who went forth to battle for their country in its hour of need had to be sent back to quell riots and disturbances in the great city of New York during the trying times of the rebellion.

The people of the United States have not forgotten this. There has been no loss to the material wealth of the country from this scare. The gamblers are panic-stricken, but the people are not. As one man, with one voice, in this Congress and out of it, they upheld the dignity and honor of the United States. There is no discord anywhere except in the New York Stock Exchange. From there alone has come the demand for this legislation. Let us hearken unto the voice of the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have to devote to the subject of this bill I shall endeavor to correct certain misapprehensions or mistakes that exist in the minds of members concerning its import and effect. The occasion which has brought it forth is the message of the President of the United States, describing the necessity of the enactment of financial measures by this Congress and appealing to the patriotism of this body to provide some means for the relief of the Government in its impending difficulties in that respect. In addition to that, we have the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he has stated as a matter of fact that from the 1st day of July, 1893, until the 1st day of December, 1895, the revenues of the Government have fallen below its expenditures to the amount of $130,221,023, making an average of upward of $50,000,000 a year during the period of time referred to in this manner by the Secretary.

The appeal that is made by the President in the special message, as well as this disclosure by the Secretary of the Treasury, clearly indicates the necessity of some action on the part of this House for the purpose of relieving the Government from its apprehended financial difficulty. It is true that the Secretary himself has denied the necessity of any aid or assistance on the part of Congress; but we have the acknowledged fact of this immense discrepancy between the revenues and expenditures, which appeals in stronger terms for the action of this House than any language that could be used by the Secretary urging it to aid and assist him in defraying the expenses of the Government. It is for the purpose of relieving the great emergency indicated by the message of the President and by the state of the Treasury receipts that this bill has been introduced.

I shared with many other gentlemen the apprehension which existed when the bill first came before the House, that all the greenbacks and Treasury notes that might be redeemed by the fund to be raised under authority of this bill would be retired and forever extinguished. That arose not simply out of the language of the bill itself or its general scope, but from the fact that these notes were to be redeemed. There was to be a redemption of them; and the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as the President of the United States, would have assumed, if the bill had remained in that form, that that provision meant a permanent retirement of these bills so far as they should be redeemed. But in order to obviate the possibility that such an effect should be given to the bill, an important change was made in it as it was again presented in this House for final consideration and action, and as the bill now appears before the House there is no danger, no risk, of the retirement and extinguishment of the greenbacks or the Treasury notes.

You look at the language of the first section of the bill and find there that the security for the circulation under this bill is to be maintained. It is true the bill has provided additional means for raising money by the issuance of United States bonds, and that the money raised in this manner shall be applied to the redemption of the greenback currency and of the Treasury notes. That section has provided still further that under the proviso in this section this bill shall have no effect whatever in the way of restricting the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem and extinguish these notes. On the contrary, it is stated in the first section of the bill that the preceding law on the subject, which was passed for the purpose of preventing the retirement of these notes, shall remain in full force and effect, undisturbed by the language of this section.

I now call the attention of the House to the language of the law which was passed for the purpose of preventing the retirement of these notes, as indicating not only the possibility, but the entire feasibility of retaining all the greenback circulation in the hands of the people except such small amount as may find its way for the time being to the Treasury after this bill shall have become law. The language is this:

> And whenever any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury, under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be issued and paid out again and kept in circulation.

That is the language of the law of 1879, which this bill proposes to continue in force and effect, without any modification or restriction whatever. So that there is nothing here that is proposed to be enacted into law that will in any manner contract the circulation of the Treasury notes. The obligation of the Secretary of the Treasury is that, as these notes may come into his hands or possession, he shall reissue them and keep them in circulation.

Now, the main advantage of the first section of this bill consists in the further provision that when these bonds are to be sold upon the market for the purpose of replenishing the gold supply of the Treasury it shall not be done by mere private negotiation, as sales have been made heretofore, but that the bonds shall be advertised for the open market, and every individual shall be at liberty to become a competitor in the purchase of them, and to pay his gold into the hands of the Treasurer of the United States for the purpose of securing the redemption of the greenbacks, instead of putting the bonds into the hands of foreign dealers or of capitalists in this country intending to send them into foreign countries.

There is nothing, therefore, in this section of the bill that provides in any respect whatever, or permits by any device whatever, the contraction of the circulating Treasury notes of the United States, and members have fallen into a mistake who have endeavored to impress upon the House the idea that the enactment of this bill into a law would destroy the circulation of the Treasury notes or of the greenbacks. It is impossible that it should do so, for the reason that while the bill provides for the redemption of these notes it retains in full force and effect the preceding law which makes it the duty of the Treasury to circulate these notes again and to keep them in circulation.

Now, is there anything in the second section which restricts the action of the Secretary, or his authority, in reference to the circulation of these notes? Not one single word. On the other hand, the second section simply provides for meeting an emergency that may arise owing to a deficiency of the revenue received from customs duties, or from other sources, by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, as a means of providing "for any temporary deficiency now existing, or which may hereafter occur," to sell these small obligations for the purpose of raising money to meet the expenditures of the Government. Then it is provided also by the last sentence of the section that "the proceeds thereof shall be used for the purposes prescribed in this section and for no other." There is nothing, therefore, in the way of the continued circulation of the Treasury notes of the United States. There is nothing here to restrict in any way the authority of the Secretary or to relieve him from the duty of keeping these notes in circulation, notwithstanding their redemption and notwithstanding their payment into the Treasury. It is simply to relieve the Government in extraordinary emergencies, when there may be a temporary deficiency in receipts to meet its expenditures, that these small obligations may be sold and lawful money may be received in payment for them, and that money disbursed for the purpose of relieving the situation.

That is as far as section 2 goes, either by its language or by any fair construction of it, under any condition or circumstances that may arise.

We therefore have, in the contemplation of this bill, not only the sale of United States bonds upon a fair competitive notice published to the world, but, in addition to that, we have the further provision that when the bonds shall be sold and the money realized, and greenbacks or Treasury notes redeemed with that money, the Treasury notes are not to be locked up in the Treasury, are not to go out of circulation, but it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue those notes, and not only to reissue them, but, under the law as it stands, to keep them in circulation. And it is only when these notes shall prove to be insufficient to answer the purposes of the Government, or when some temporary emergency shall occur, or, in the language of the act, when "any temporary deficiency" shall arise, that resort can be had to the issuing of these small obligations under the second section of this bill.

There is consequently no danger whatever that there can be any contraction of the currency or that there can be such a piling up of the Treasury notes in the Treasury of the United States as by any possibility to amount to a contraction or a withdrawal of these circulating notes from the business of the country. The notes themselves are esteemed, confided in, and maintained by the people of the United States. There is no disposition upon their part to require their retirement. There is no disposition exhibited in this proposed bill to secure that end, but, on the contrary, it simply provides a means by which the gold reserve may be maintained intact sufficient to meet all the requirements of redemption as these bills may be presented at the Treasury, and at the same time to keep the bills, after their redemption in this manner, in circulation throughout the country, and only to resort to the other expedient provided for in section 2 when there shall be "some temporary deficiency," either existing at the present time or that "may hereafter occur," requiring to be met by the provisions contained in section 2.

There is consequently, I repeat, no danger to the business interests of the country, either by contraction of the currency or in any other respect, from the enactment of this bill into a law, and it is an entirely erroneous impression that it can by any possibility result in any diminution of the circulating medium which the people have esteemed so highly and confided in so generally, which has carried the Government through so many emergencies, and which is ready to perform the same service hereafter for the people of the United States. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether there is anything in this bill which in his opinion would necessarily retire the Treasury notes?

Mr. DANIELS. No, sir; the notes will all stand on the same footing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I am the judge of my duty as a Republican and as a representative of the people who sent me here, and I can not delegate that privilege to another. We excused ourselves as Republicans for our votes yesterday for a Democratic tariff "forrevenue only" bill by the claim that an emergency had arisen, that the President had appealed to us for help, and that we must act promptly. That emergency we claimed yesterday we had provided for, although we knew that the President would not sign such a bill, and we might as well have passed a genuine Republican protective tariff bill.

Now, what other emergency has arisen that requires this haste in authorizing the issue of "more bonds," while the President now has unlimited power to issue bonds and this bill in no wise restricts that power. On the contrary, it expressly states that it is in addition to the power already granted him. Indeed, we are told by the papers this morning that the President is now negotiating for the sale of $200,000,000 of bonds; that the sale will be concluded within a few days, either with the syndicate that took the other bonds or with Russia, irrespective of what this House may do. I ask what emergency has arisen to justify the passage of this bill? I know of none, except that the other day two or three stock gamblers in the city of New York failed, and we were told yesterday that one of these would probably get upon his feet before he was counted out. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, stripped of its wrappings, divested of all its attempted disguise, this bill appears to me a proposition to destroy the greenbacks, all of them. It either means that, or it means nothing. Gentlemen of the Republican side of the House, are you ready to do that? Are you ready to take even the chance of doing that? Who has asked you to do it? The people? No. There never has come to one of you any demand from the people anywhere in the United States that this thing be done. Who asks for it, I repeat? The Democratic President in his last frantic message to this House asks for it. That was the alpha and omega of that message, "Destroy the greenbacks and issue bonds." This demand is echoed by the bankers, the bond speculators, and stock gamblers of New York; and now we have the Secretary of the Treasury hoarsely bawling "Destroy the greenbacks!" and Wall street opens wide its ugly mug to swallow "more bonds."

It seems to me this bill comes in here in response to their demands, and a deaf ear has been turned to the voice of the people.

You know that the people of the United States are opposed to the destruction of the greenbacks. They remember that the greenbacks enabled them to carry to a successful conclusion the war for the preservation of the Union. They know that for twenty-five years thereafter the greenbacks continued to be the money of the people, of all the people. And we had no other money during the most prosperous era of the Republic. Those greenbacks during all those years were "sound money"; they were "honest dollars" up to the day that Grover Cleveland was inaugurated President of the United States and launched his cry, "Destroy the greenbacks and issue bonds." [Applause.] That is all there is against the greenbacks now—the Cleveland-Carlisle cry. Every one of you Republicans—and I want to talk to Republicans—I have no desire to talk to Democrats [laughter]; they seem to be going all right on this bill—every one of you Republicans, when upon the stump addressing your constituents, has denounced the President for doing exactly what you propose to do in indorsing this bill. Yet, in spite of that, we have now the astounding spectacle of Republicans not only indorsing the President in that for which they have heretofore condemned him, but proposing to give him greater power, the power to destroy the greenbacks and contract the currency of this nation to the extent of $346,000,000. That is what this bill means, if it means anything.

You know that this bill can not become a law. You know, every one of you, that it can not pass the Senate of the United States. No man believes that it will. But with the passage of this bill by the votes of the Republican majority here the mischief is accomplished, for you have become participants and sharers in the odium of the issue of all these bonds not with the Democratic party, but with the Democratic Administration. There is, you know a great gulf between these two. And you have got to meet that responsibility every one of you. You have got to spend all your time in the next canvass explaining, or trying to explain, why you did this; why, at this time, you sought refuge under the umbrella of Grover Cleveland, who has gathered you in as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with a most singular and contradictory state of things. The President, in a message this to Congress, sent in seven days ago, said, among other things:

> We are in the midst of another season of perplexity caused by our dangerous and fatuous financial operations.

Mr. Speaker, that sentence exactly characterizes Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle's financial operations during the last two and a half years. The country never saw anything of the kind before. The President in this extraordinary message goes on to say:

> I ask, at the hands of the Congress, such prompt aid as it alone has the power to give * * * to relieve the dangers of the present emergency.

Yet it is notorious that, at the very time he was writing these words to Congress, he was secretly negotiating for the sale of one hundred or two hundred million dollars of bonds to the same syndicate that cleared up so many million dollars profit from the other secret sale, and are now hungry for more. And these sales have been denounced by all the people of the United States.

He says further:

> The real cure for our recurring troubles can only be effected by a complete change in our financial system.

That's true, and the change needed is from his system, controlled and administered by English financiers and the shylocks of Wall street, to an American system administered by Americans.

For the quarter of a century previous to the second advent of Cleveland the financial system of this country was on an American basis, and every dollar, whether of gold, silver, or paper, which bore the stamp of the United States was an honest dollar, and prosperity continued under that system up to that unfortunate day when the band of foreign conspirators, having its headquarters in the foreign city of New York, came into power through the Cleveland Administration. And what a condition they have brought the country to in their struggle to displace the money of the Constitution with their robber dollars! Ah, sir, we had better have cheap and honest American dollars than the foreign costly and dishonest dollars, through which our industries have been prostrated, our people robbed, and the National Treasury looted.

This band of foreign mercenaries, who have neither patriotism nor any love of country, acknowledge no flag, are flooding the land with their so-called "sound-currency" publications. They conjure up the horrible phantom of a silver basis—that, they say, threatens this country—wherewith to frighten the ignorant. Sir, there is not upon the earth to-day a nation that is upon the so-called silver basis that has not prospered, while this nation has suffered untold miseries during all the time Cleveland and his colleagues have been trying to force this country to a dishonest gold basis.

We find this bond bill brought in by Republicans. They say it is in response to the appeal of the President, and the burden of their argument is, "We must support the President in this emergency," but up to this time no one other reason have they given for the passage of this bill. They talk continually about an "emergency," but not one of the supporters of this bill has deigned to tell what the emergency is. On the other hand, the Democratic party, as represented in Congress, appears to be unanimously opposed to the bill and declares that it is wrong, and that no emergency exists warranting it.

Mr. Speaker, when I have to choose in a case like this, I had rather stand with the Democratic party when it stands on the side of the people, as it does on this bill (for what reason, I care not) than to support a Democratic Administration that stands in with the gold gamblers of Wall street, and has stood with them since the day of its inauguration, to the irreparable injury of the people of the United States.

Pass this bill, gentlemen of the Republican side, and forever after hold your peace as to Grover Cleveland, for you will have exonerated him from every charge you have made against him respecting the sale of the bonds. You will have indorsed his Administration and he will have bagged more Republican lame ducks than he ever brought down at one shot before. And do not forget that day before yesterday, with his right barrel, he fetched a pure Democratic "tariff-for-revenue-only" bill out of a big Republican flock.

Still we may defend ourselves to some extent with the fact that the horizontal bill is some improvement upon the present "tariff for England's glory only." But how can a Republican excuse himself for voting for this bill?

Gentlemen say we must defend the credit of the nation. Sir, if we keep on defending it this way our occupation will soon be gone, for there will be no credit to defend.

Mr. Speaker, the frantic message sent us by the President is in strict accordance with his programme to place this country at the mercy of foreign financiers, the essential feature of which programme is to make dollars dear and labor cheap. That is Mr. Cleveland's platform, and he has been so successful that he has doubled the debt of every farmer and producer who was in debt when this Administration came in, and the logical, inevitable condition to which Mr. Cleveland's theories have brought the country has cut in two the day's pay of nearly every workingman in the country. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed to see Republicans seconding Mr. Cleveland in his work of subjugating the American workingmen and the American producers, putting them on a level with the cheap and pauper labor of Europe.

I repeat that not one reason has been advanced by its supporters for the passage of this bill. The Treasury report of this morning shows a balance of $170,000,000 on the right side. Leading Democrats on the floor of this House have told you to-day that it is not necessary; Democrats who have been through thick and thin the stanch supporters of the President have told you this; the Secretary of the Treasury denounces it, though this latter fact may aid its passage—may have been intended to.

And now, in conclusion, I want to say to you Republicans that when this bill is passed, if such a calamity is to overtake the Republican party, I beg that you will amend the title of the bill so that it shall show the purpose and effect of the measure. Make it read, "A bill to retire Republican Congressmen and Republican Senators from Congress." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I appeal to you Republicans in the words of the gallant Sheridan, when in the Shenandoah Valley he found his men flying before the enemy, "Face the other way, boys!" he shouted; "face the other way!" And they did and routed the enemy. I ask you Republicans to face the other way. Face the enemies of the common people. Stand with the people who sent you here. Stand with them in this fight made against them by the associated syndicates. [Applause.] Say in the spirit of Andrew Jackson, "By the Eternal, the greenback shall be preserved for the use of all the people!" [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WILSON] undertakes to answer for two great States so widely separated as Idaho, the State of his adoption, and Pennsylvania, the State of his birth, he must inform himself better concerning the sentiment of his native State before he attempts to make such assertions as he has made to-night on the floor of this House. When he says there is no sentiment in Pennsylvania in favor of this bill, and when he refers to the city of Philadelphia in particular, I wish to tell him (and that is my only excuse for asking to occupy ten minutes now in addressing the House) that when I returned to my home a few days since I met, not the stock gamblers of the New York Stock Exchange, to which he referred, but the manufacturers of the greatest manufacturing city in our country—I met the business men of that city, and it was they who stopped me on the street and said, "ADAMS, can't you do something at Washington to save us from the crisis that hangs over the country?"

Mr. Speaker, we have people in Philadelphia who are enthusiasts on party measures; we have people in Philadelphia who are "dyed in the wool" and always maintain the Republican doctrines. And yet I have heard them say in this emergency, "Sustain any measure to save us and to save the country from the crisis which is now impending and the difficulties that surround us; meet the Administration and render what aid can be rendered in the emergency." They ask us to meet the President who has called upon us for assistance; they say, "You have been returned with a tremendous majority to the House of Representatives by the people of this country and we call on you to stop the bad system existing; put an end to the vicious legislation; stop the financial terror which is sweeping over the land and enact good, wholesome financial measures to give the business and the manufacturing interests of the country a chance to recuperate."

Mr. BOWERS. On free wool?

Mr. ADAMS. That evil will no longer exist, I will say to my friend from California. I do not want to take time now to debate the provisions of the bill passed on yesterday, but it is a part of the remedial legislation which the loyal House of Representatives has been called upon to enact. Here it goes a step further in the pending bill.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is scarcely any opposition to the second section of the pending bill, so I shall address myself to the first section, the object of which is to maintain intact the coin redemption fund in the Treasury. Every civilized nation in the world considers it essential to its prosperity to have a reserve fund of gold to protect its currency, whether it be paper, gold, silver, or both metals combined. In our country the limit of that reserve has been fixed at $100,000,000 to secure the very miscellaneous and mixed currency which afflicts our people. But, unfortunately, America has gotten to be the gold pot of the world. When a nation needs gold to strengthen its currency it helps itself from the free pot of America. The bankers of Europe supplied Austria, which has lately reformed her currency upon a specie basis, with $12,000,000 in gold, on which they made a handsome premium. When they needed the gold all they had to do was to come to America and help themselves.

Under our present financial condition and under existing legislation, so long as they can gather greenbacks, all they have to do is to take them to the Treasury of the United States, demand and get for them our gold. The result of this is that we have to buy the gold back at an enormous premium in order to keep up the reserve. Again quite recently Australia needed $3,000,000 in gold, and the bankers supplied it. And here, again, we find that they came to America and depleted our reserve and supplied it from our stock. That is the case with all the nations in the world who need gold. Every nation in the world, except our own, can preserve its reserve fund. In England when gold is too freely exported the Bank of England raises the rate of discount and puts a stop to it. In France the man does not live who can go to the bank with a large check and get it cashed in gold. They will not give it unless he states that it is for mercantile transactions, or to be remitted in payment of a gold obligation.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, will assist our Treasury to preserve its gold intact. And I wish to throw out one single suggestion which may assist in the consideration of this matter, and which has not been mentioned, so far as I have heard, in the course of this discussion. On last Friday, when the panic was at its height in New York, when Europe had been sacrificing our securities, owing to a breakdown, as was believed, in our credit, and the bankers needed gold to remit by Saturday's steamer, what was the effect? As is always the case on such occasions, the money market tightened, and it was impossible to secure greenbacks or Treasury notes of large denominations to enable them to withdraw the gold.

Now, this is the thought that I would develop, and show the House that if the bonds are issued and greenbacks go into the Treasury, the Secretary will have it in his power to retain in the Treasury greenbacks and the Treasury notes of the larger denominations, and issue then only the smaller notes. Banks can not draw our gold out if they must collect for that purpose bills of small denominations. Think of the labor of getting a half a million dollars out of the Treasury on dollar bills or bills of small denominations! Think of the time taken to count it, the cost of exporting it, and other matters in connection with such a transaction. If the large bills are kept in the Treasury it will not interfere with the business transactions of the country, for we all know that sums of large amount are always paid by checks. It will not interfere with the business of the country in any way. As a matter of fact, 94 per cent of the exchanges in the business of the country are by checks or drafts, and about 6 per cent only is actually paid by notes. Now, if the smaller bills are left out, it will not interfere with the large transactions which are made by check, and the smaller transactions, which are mostly in the retail business, will not be interfered with, because these transactions are mainly with small bills.

This bill, therefore, will put it into the hands and into the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to imitate foreign nations to a certain extent, and to throw an obstacle in the way of the bankers in depleting the Treasury of the gold reserve.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say further that I have heard a great deal that has been said here about how we will explain to our constituents our votes when we seek reelection. Well, I have a conscious feeling that I am doing what is for the benefit, not only of the people of my district, but for the whole country. I am not afraid, and never have been since I have been in public life, of going ahead and proceeding in that direction. Do what is right. The people of America have more sense than any other nation in the world, for we are better educated and have more intelligence and brighter ideas, and when the people realize that their representatives, in the light of the best knowledge at their command, are doing what is in their interest, my friend from California need have no fear but that the people will recognize his services and return him to Congress.

Now, gentlemen, I wish to say one word about what always comes up here in debate about the stock exchanges and the commercial marts and the gamblers of New York. Why, the stock exchange of New York and the commercial exchange which deals in the commodities of this great land are nothing but the thermometers that reflect the sentiments of the people, their hopes, their fears, and what they think of the current events that are passing. My friend from Idaho [Mr. WILSON] talks of the gamblers of Wall street. Does he forget that within a stone's throw of the stock exchange there is the great commercial exchange where cotton and petroleum and coal and the other products of this country are bought and sold? It was not only the stock-exchange gamblers that were paralyzed the other day. Did not the price of wheat fall? Is not the West interested in that? Did not the price of cotton fall? Has not the South an interest in that? When you paralyze the business of this country all interests are affected. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the bill now before this House presents two great problems demanding our attention. The first is how to maintain the gold reserve, and the second is how to provide for a temporary deficiency in the Treasury. The Republican party is pledged to maintain the gold reserve, and the Cleveland wing of the Democratic party is also pledged to maintain the gold reserve. That reserve is now being depleted. It has reached the danger point. And the question is, shall we allow the process of depletion to go on until a financial panic results from the failure of the Treasury to meet its obligations by redeeming greenbacks in gold? The first section of the bill gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue 3 per cent bonds instead of 4 and 5 per cent bonds to maintain the gold reserve, and prohibits any bonds being sold secretly, but requires them to be sold on due advertisement.

Now, suppose we fail to pass the first section of this bill, and go home to our constituents, and they say to us, "How is it that you failed to pass the bill to maintain the gold reserve?" What answer will we make? Suppose we fail to pass the first section of this bill. What would be the result? The laws in force at this time are the same laws that Mr. Cleveland has acted under heretofore when he secretly sold bonds to foreign bankers, and if we fail to pass this section of the bill he will make another secret contract and sell more 4 or 5 per cent bonds to the foreign bankers. If we fail to pass this bill and go home and our constituents say to us, "Why didn't you stop that man Cleveland making his secret contracts with foreign bankers? Why didn't you stay his hand?" What answer will we be able to make? None. We shall be dumb as sheep before their shearers. It is our duty, while preparing to maintain the gold reserve, to maintain it in such a way that at the same time we will maintain the honor of the American people. [Applause.] And I say the honor of the American people is not maintained when we make secret financial treaties with foreign bankers, and get foreign gold when we could have gotten American gold.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; you may not. [Laughter.] Now, what do we want to do? We want to pass a measure that will enable the President of the United States to sell coin-bearing bonds in our own country, and we want to attach a provision to it that will prevent any more secret contracts with Belmont, Morgan, or Rothschild. [Applause.] And you gentlemen, you Republicans here who are antagonizing this measure may not know it, but you are playing into the hands of Rothschild. Every one of you are playing into the hands of Rothschild and into the hands of Wall street, and your constituents will hold you to a stern responsibility.

So far as I am concerned, I defy Rothschild, and I defy Morgan, and I defy Belmont; and I want an appeal to be made to the American people to see if they have not got the money in their pockets to loan to our Government. I say the people who sustained this Government with their bayonets will, when the proper time comes and the proper appeal is made, sustain it with their gold. All you have to do is to appeal to them. And I want to say another thing here. I have been fighting a minority battle in Tennessee for many years, and I have learned that whenever I saw the Democrats take one end of the road I have found it safest to take the other end. [Applause and laughter.] And whenever I hear the Democratic party applauding a Republican speech I know that Republican is going astray. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I want no applause from the Democratic side for any of my political utterances.

Mr. MILES. Don't be alarmed; you will not get any.

Mr. GIBSON. The failure to get any is what brought me here. [Renewed laughter and applause.] The man in my district who gets Democratic applause is doomed.

I want to say further that I represent a district in this House that never has sent a Democrat to the Congress of the United States in forty years, and while reason and patriotism reign in the brains of my constituents they never will. [Renewed laughter and applause.] What is more, I represent a section of Tennessee that put more Union soldiers into the Union army than there were voters. [Applause.] I don't want any more bonds issued, but, if any more are issued I want them to draw a lower rate of interest and run for a shorter time than the law now authorizes; and I want them issued openly and publicly, and in broad daylight, and not secretly or in the dark, and I want the highest and best bidder to get them; and, above all, I want every American citizen to have a fair chance to buy if he wishes.

The next section of this bill, Mr. Speaker, provides a remedy for any deficiency that now exists or may hereafter arise. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness, not more than fifty millions in amount, payable in three years, at 3 per cent interest, to provide for any temporary deficiency in the Treasury. What is the situation of affairs to-day in the United States? Are not the public receipts insufficient to meet the expenses of our Government? Has not Mr. Cleveland unsheathed the sword in his message on the Venezuelan question, and did not the other side of the House vote with this side unanimously to appropriate $100,000 to pay commissioners to ascertain the true boundary of Venezuela? Now, we are in a fine plight to defy with an empty Treasury the greatest military and naval power on earth.

The second section of this bill provides that the President of the United States may borrow $50,000,000 should an emergency arise. If no emergency arises, no money will be borrowed; but if an emergency should arise, if our Treasury should become empty—what then? Run this great Government, pay the pensioners, and defend the American continent against European aggression, with an empty Treasury! Will we, Republicans, be doing our duty to our country if we refuse to help the President because he is a Democrat, and because he and his party are responsible for our financial distress? There is one trouble in this question—so many of us suppose it is a political matter when it is an American matter. On this side of the House we Republicans sometimes forget we are Americans, but on your side you Democrats always forget that you are Americans. [Laughter and applause.] This is not strictly a Republican question. It is an American question. We are responding to an appeal from a Democratic President, it is true; but while he is a Democrat, he is also President of the United States of America [applause]; and we Republicans always stand up for our Government. When the President of the United States raises the American flag, as he did in his Venezuelan message, the Republican party rallied around him to a man; and when he sends a special message here saying that he wants financial relief we come to him, not as a Democratic President, but as President of the United States of America. And in voting for this measure I vote for it in response to the appeal of the President of the United States, in support of my Government, and in support of the credit of my country; and I doubt not that my constituents will say unto me, "Well done, good and faithful servant." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, we are supposed at this time to be engaged in legislation suggested by a special emergency. This emergency is supposed to have brought forth its first fruits yesterday, and the full fruition, it is supposed, will be reached to-morrow. The emergency is one suggested by the special message of the President sent to Congress last week. The fact that this House, with its tremendous Republican majority, has decided to forego the usual holiday recess and devote itself to legislation upon the suggestion of the President that a special emergency exists for legislation is an admission upon the part of the Republican party of this House that such emergency does exist, and that it ought at once to be met by that party, the responsible party here at this time.

The Republican party having gone thus far, having taken the President as authority for theexistence of the alleged emergency, are they not reasonably bound to consider well what he says in regard to the character of the emergency and the remedy which is demanded? Yesterday a bill was passed by this House largely increasing the duties upon imported articles, touching everything, I believe, in the schedules with a rise except sugar. That was done, we were told, to supply needed revenue, although the authority which has convinced the majority in this House that the special emergency exists has advised us that there is no need for additional revenue. Legislation far different is demanded by the President to meet the exigencies of the case, as he states it. Starting out with your concession that the President is right when he says an emergency for further financial legislation exists, and claiming, as you did, to be acting in response to the President's invitation, this House yesterday, to meet that emergency, did precisely what the President said was and is totally unnecessary.

The Republican party in this House, having again decided that the President is right in proclaiming the existence of the emergency, is now about doing, to meet that emergency, something more that the President has not asked or suggested. At the same time, as I believe, the Republican House, by this bond measure, is practically applying, covertly and hypocritically, under another name, the President's remedy—more bonds. The President believes it is necessary to redeem with gold the greenbacks and the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman bullion-purchasing law, and necessary, also, to provide for an increase of the gold reserve, by issuing and selling for gold bonds payable by their own express terms in gold. You Republicans, pretending to accept the Presidential invitation and to heed the Presidential warning, are providing now for bonds payable in coin, knowing that, according to the Presidential interpretation—not the law—these bonds will be paid in gold. You are then authorizing the President to pursue, upon a broader plane, the policy of issuing bonds to be paid in gold, although they may be paid, should be paid, under the law and by their terms, in silver as well as gold. While asserting a pretended conviction that the greenbacks ought not to be canceled or retired, and that the notes issued under the Sherman law ought not to be thrown into the waste basket, you yet attempt to inflict upon the country a law which would enable the Treasury authorities to retire the greenbacks and Sherman notes and keep them out of circulation, increase the bonded debt of the nation at will; to do precisely what gentlemen here advocating the passage of your bond bill say they are opposed to doing.

It was said yesterday in the discussion of the tariff bill that, as a great concession, a most sweet-smelling sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism, the Republican party was departing for the time being from its policy of protection, and proceeding upon Democratic lines, laying a tariff for the sole and very urgent purpose of raising revenue. The assumption is incorrect. If correct, it would be a disgraceful assumption and a disgraceful assertion. If your party is committed to the policy of protection and believes in it, why should you deny that in what you were doing you were moving on protection lines, in accordance with your professions and beliefs? Why should you, in passing a bill to greatly increase tariff duties, insist that you are not doing it for the sake of protection; that protection is not in it and of it; that yours is a bill framed upon Democratic principles to meet the requirements of an emergency for good legislation? Why such stultification?

As was well remarked to-day by the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS], if the tariff bill which you rushed through the House yesterday is to be productive of anything, if the "needed revenue"—you know very well that there is not the least danger of a Treasury deficit—if the needed revenue is to be supplied by means of your tariff bill, what need of this grant of limitless power, of boundless authority, to issue and sell bonds and lay additional obligations, taxes, and burdens upon not only the American people of to-day, but also upon the people unborn who shall dwell in this land in the distant future?

There was some talk here yesterday to the effect that your tariff bill was not McKinleyism.

McKinleyism is a term descriptive of a bill passed by the Fifty-first Congress and of the so-called protection embodied in it. But it is a misnomer. From what I have seen since I have been a member of this body, from what I have learned from others whose experience and observation are far greater than mine, I believe that law would be much better and more fitly named if it were called the Reed bill, if it were named after the genius of the Fifty-first Congress, and if credit were due—and from the Republican view much credit is due—it ought to be given to the man whose will power and whose brain power carried that bill, as they carried other bad measures, through the Fifty-first Congress, and promise to carry many through this Congress. The legislation that has occupied us here so far is distinctively Republican. It is Republicanism voiced by the dominant element of the Republican party. It is Republicanism framed and shaped by the man who was the ruling power of that party in the Fifty-first Congress, as he is its ruling power in this. What, then, is the use of talking about this legislation not being Republican? Why talk about it falling short of McKinleyism? It is all of the McKinleyism, Reedism, Republicanism that you dare now to venture upon.

It is legislation upon the same old lines, dictated by the same great power—the foremost man of the Republican party—the Speaker of this House. It is Republican because it is protective in tariff and destructive in finance. Yours is legislation increasing the taxes of the people for the benefit of the manufacturers and the bond dealers and bondholders, and that is Republicanism. Why shrink from the responsibility of giving it its true name? Why try to deceive the people? Why claim to be rising above party when you are only decrying your own party principles and falling below your own professions and beliefs? In this present attempt at legislation you are seeking to perpetuate the policy of mortgaging this country to the grasping bond mongers while you suffer to lie idle and useless in the Treasury silver out of which there might be coined money enough to supply any deficiency in the revenue—if there really be any—as well as to give to the bondholders coin, as nominated in their bonds; silver coin partly, and not gold coin altogether. How simple and plain the remedy which would naturally suggest itself to the mind of a man from the walks of the common people.

There lies in the Treasury, unused, covered by dust and cobwebs, the material to make nearly two hundred millions of good sound silver dollars, "coin" dollars. Why juggle with this term "coin"? If you want "coin," why not make coin as the true policy of the Government has always been, as the will of the plain people now is—why not make "coin" out of silver as well as out of gold? Instead of providing for issuing $50,000,000 of emergency certificates, as you do in this bill, to supply the lack of needed revenues, as you profess, why not get out of the silver seigniorage, lying useless in the Treasury because you will not use it, fifty-five millions of good "coin" dollars? Why not coin the other silver that is in the Treasury, useless, too, because you will have it so, and take in the notes issued under the Sherman law, which you say are a constant menace to the peace, the safety, and the credit of this country? Why not retire those notes by coining that silver, and putting out the silver dollars, or, in their place, silver certificates, made a legal tender for all debts and dues, public and private?

I, for my part, have no patience with the state of mind which regards the money that is good enough for the people, the money that is used in all the transactions of the people, as unfit to be paid to the privileged class of wealthy holders of the bonds of this Government. Money which is good enough for the farmer, and the mechanic, and the laborer, good enough for all the people of this land in their business transactions, and which every citizen is compelled to accept at the option of his debtor, when tendered in payment of a debt, ought, in all good conscience, to be good enough for that extraordinarily favored class, the rich men who hold the bonds of this Government and yearn for more of them. If I had the power, if the mighty Democratic party—I speak of the rank and file, the mass of the party—could be heard and could put into law their voice and their will, the silver of this land would be coined as gold is coined. Silver and gold coinage would be restored as it existed in the days of our fathers, and there would still be afloat, as there ought to be, this currency of greenbacks, a currency that has met with favor among the people, and that has been found safe, sound, convenient, and altogether satisfactory in the commercial transactions of the country.

This policy of issuing bonds in time of peace—in any time except in stress of war, when the choice is between national overthrow and a resort to that desperate expedient of bonding the future as well as the present—this policy is un-American in its character, monarchical in its tendency, oppressive and demoralizing in its effect. If we could only abandon this policy, turn our faces against it and against all such cheap expedients as this that you now offer—apologized for by every man who advocates it, and thus condemned by friend and by foe—if we could turn our faces resolutely and effectively against this policy, if you would let us legislate for the people of the land instead of for Wall street, New York, and State street, London, how much better it would be for our countrymen! Then, indeed, the credit, the honor, and the glory of this country would be advanced and real patriotism would be exemplified.

What is the use of issuing these bonds? You do not even destroy by this bill the power to issue 4 per cent or 5 per cent bonds. "In addition" to those provided for by the resumption act, so your bill recites, the Treasury Department may issue bonds bearing only 3 per cent interest. There is no stoppage of the power of issuing bonds; there is no limitation placed upon it; you enlarge it. But the bill provides—mark the beneficent feature—that the sale of bonds shall be advertised! There shall no longer be secret dealings with syndicates, which I neither uphold, nor defend, nor apologize for. The bonds shall be advertised for sale. But the bond issues and the bond sales shall go on—such is the Republican decree—without check or limit, but in greater variety. You know that more bonds will soon be issued, and having the power to prevent the issue and being unwilling to exercise it, you lend your approval.

Why, $500,000,000 of paper money in this country may be withdrawn from circulation, with your consent, at the will of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury—those now in office, or any who may come into office—in order that the gold reserve may be preserved; in order that the people may have less money with which to conduct their business; in order that wheat may be lower and stocks and bonds higher; in order that the people who toil and make the wealth of this land may enjoy less of it, and those who gamble and traffic in the products of the toil of the millions may make more. That is the policy which Republicanism would fasten upon us, and upon our children, and children's children, to the remotest generation. And you call this patriotism!

The real question here is whether we shall resort to silver as well as gold; whether, if it be necessary to call upon the American people to sustain the credit of the American nation, there shall be issued obligations bearing interest, or whether this brave, generous, patriotic people shall be allowed to take, as they will take freely and in large quantities, notes issued by the Government fashioned to pass from hand to hand as money and draw no interest.

You provide for issuing $50,000,000 of special emergency bonds. Why not provide, if there be necessity for any such provision, for $50,000,000 of Treasury notes, to be added to the amount of money in circulation in this country, and to elevate to some extent the prices of the products of the people, now depressed to the point of absolute distress and ruin? You who will be responsible for the passage of this bill certainly can not dodge that responsibility by claiming that you have arisen upon the wings of patriotism far above partisanship.

There is lurking in this thing—all over it, on top of it, below it, around it—as much partisanship as could ever be injected into anything by anybody. And yet there still remains the question, Shall the people be deprived of their ancient right to have coined the silver of the country? Shall they still be compelled to pay interest on bonds when they would take the notes of their Government, to circulate as money, free of all interest? Shall the taxes upon the people be increased? Shall their substance be mortgaged against their will? Shall the power of the jobbers in money and bonds be made greater and their profits largely increased?

Shall we, at the very moment when we are flinging defiance in the face of England, fasten still more securely the financial yoke of the mistress of the ocean? Shall we say to-day to Great Britain, "It is an affair of ours whether you filch, as you have been filching all over the world, a slice of Venezuelan territory;" and the next day declare to her, "Upon your financial plan we, your debtors, shall build our own structure, and what you want us to do in this country we will do"? Mr. Speaker, whatever be the fate of this bill, whether men apologize and vote for it, under the persuasive influence of the party lash, or condemn it and vote against it, however it be dealt with here or elsewhere, it is after all an attempt to perpetuate the policy of issuing bonds; to perpetuate the gold standard; to deny the possibility, as far as you have the power of denying it, of bimetallism, and to leave our people powerless, as far as you have the ability to do so, to correct the evils which you have inflicted upon them.

Mr. Speaker, in the great State in which I live, and which I have the honor to represent, in part, upon this floor, unprecedented floods have lately swept away much of the substance of the farmer. The destruction has been great, and disaster prevails where but yesterday rich valleys were vast granaries. To-day many sturdy farmers are bereft not only of the fruits of last summer's toil but have seen the savings of a lifetime melt away in the wild waters. Whole communities, who taxed themselves to build bridges and other public improvements, have but the burden of taxation left to remind them of what they did and had and lost. I sympathize with these good people in their distress, wrought by the elements. I pity them in the added distress which your legislation will bring; for the flood of woes that you will let loose upon all the poor and unfortunate people of this land, if you persist in your past and present policy of mortgaging all that the people have and taxing them upon all they need, will amount to a deluge of far-reaching and long-enduring hardship.

Fellow-Representatives, are you willing to fasten perpetually upon our people the policy of the English with reference to a gold standard and the issuing of bonds? You have the power, why not pass a law now to prevent the issuing of any bonds at all? Why talk about the beneficent act you propose to pass, when you have it in your power to prevent the President and the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing bonds at all, from making any private or secret contracts with any bond syndicate, or involving this country in further obligations on account of bonds, principal or interest? Why not sweep from the statute books all power to make contracts with anybody, anyway, for the issuance of any bonds? I repeat, you have the power. Why not use it for the people? Upon this side of the House the vast majority of us will join in any such effort; and the American people will say to us "Well done" far more heartily than they will say it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] for the vote he seems so willing to cast in favor of the pending measure.

Mr. DOVENER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I will yield for a question.

Mr. DOVENER. I wish to ask if you maintained the same financial views——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Please go on with your question, my time is slipping away.

Mr. DOVENER. You entertained these same views in 1892, I suppose?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I did.

Mr. DOVENER. And you were then sent to Congress from your district by about 3,000 majority?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. DOVENER. Then there seems to have been another flood which passed over your district. You got here this time, I believe, by a majority of 92?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, exactly 92; but that is quite sufficient to put me here with you, who, judging from the exhibition you are making of yourself, seem to have had too much.

Mr. DOVENER. Your people seem to have passed on your views on that question again.

Mr. DE ARMOND. A gentleman who has no more idea of the proprieties of debate and the decencies obtaining among gentlemen than to interrupt another who has the floor upon a grave and important question with a suggestion no weightier than yours, certainly got here by too many votes if he got here by 1. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, we have presented to us to-night for our consideration a plain business proposition, and as the representatives of the people it strikes me that we should debate this matter as a business proposition, entirely free from political considerations, entirely free from President making, but as a practical question to be solved by the application of common-sense ideas. What are the questions we are considering to-night? First, we are not considering a proposition which is the initiative of issuing bonds to pay the general expenses of our Government. Much of the debate has proceeded along that line. Gentlemen have expressed their displeasure at the idea of selling bonds, and they have treated this as a measure to sell bonds to provide general revenue for our Government. Some Republicans have discouraged the idea, and have talked to us as though the idea of authorizing the sale of a single bond was anti-Republican.

Now, what are we doing? Suppose we do nothing, how shall we stand? We have a gold reserve of $100,000,000, the creation of Republican legislation pure and simple, fought by the entire strength of the Democratic party in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate. We have upon the statute books of the United States a statute providing for the issuance and sale of bonds—a thirty-year bond at 4 per cent and a ten-year bond at 5 per cent—and that statute is of Republican origin, passed by a Republican Congress, and if we do nothing a Democratic Administration will proceed to execute Republican legislation by selling a 4 per cent or a 5 per cent bond and borrowing an unlimited amount of money to replenish a fund created by a Republican Congress.

Is there anybody upon this floor who dare stand up here and say to-day that he is in favor of the gold reserve and yet opposed to maintaining it? How do we expect to maintain the gold reserve unless the Secretary of the Treasury has power to do so, and how do we expect to maintain the credit of this country unless we confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States ample authority to make use of all the powers of our country to maintain that credit and to say if we have not gold or silver or money to meet our obligations, that he will make use of the credit of our country the same as an individual would if he had no money? Dare anybody introduce a bill into this House to repeal the statute of 1875, which provides for the sale of bonds to keep intact the gold reserve? If so, let him stand up and have the hardihood to do so, and then to report to his constituents his action and see what the verdict will be.

The gentleman who last addressed the House [Mr. DE ARMOND] spoke tauntingly to the Republican party of its duty to wipe out this legislation providing for the sale of bonds. I have a poor memory, but poor as it is, I recollect when gentlemen upon the other side of this House had more than 100 majority for two sessions of Congress, and during most of that time their Executive was disposing of bonds under this law to keep intact the gold reserve, and not one of their number introduced a bill to repeal that statute.

Why do you taunt the Republicans upon this side when you dared not, when you had an overwhelming majority in Congress, to introduce a bill to repeal the statute which provides for the sale of bonds? Dare any man, Republican or Democrat, introduce a bill to repeal that statute? If not, then where do we stand? Dare any man stand up here, Democrat or Republican, and say he is in favor of wiping out the gold reserve? I take it for granted if any one thing is settled in this Congress it is that the greenback shall stay; that it shall not be wiped out or canceled; that it shall remain as a part of the currency of our country. If it does remain as a part of the currency of our country, dare any Representative in this body introduce a bill to wipe out the gold reserve which stands back of that greenback? If not, then we are confronted with this question: How shall we maintain that gold reserve at the least expense to this country? Shall it be by the sale of a 4 or 5 per cent bond or by the sale of a 3 per cent bond? I take it for granted that the Republicans of this House will unitedly stand in favor of keeping intact the gold reserve of $100,000,000 and will confer on the Secretary of the Treasury ample power to protect that in some manner. If not, there is no use of having a gold reserve.

We are not here to consider the question whether we will establish this gold reserve. It is established. We are not here to consider the original question of whether we will issue bonds to maintain it. That was done years ago, and I remember that the people of this country upon three several occasions have ratified the action of this House and of Congress in doing just what they did do. I remember in my great State of Ohio how in 1875 the Republican party met the Democratic party everywhere upon the stump, the Democrats maintaining that we could not resume specie payments in 1879, ridiculing the idea, and saying that $100,000,000 of a gold reserve would be wiped away as a cyclone would wipe away a pile of dry leaves. They said, "If you will establish a fund of $500,000,000, there will be some sense in it, but $100,000,000 is nonsense." I remember how in our State we fought it out with that party on two occasions, in 1875 and in 1877, and the Republican party was victorious.

The Republicans, aye, the people of this country, have ratified the action of the Republican party establishing the gold reserve and in the passage of a bill which provided for the sale of bonds. That bill was passed in a time of profound peace, to authorize the sale of bonds at 4 or 5 per cent. Now a Republican House comes here and proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds at 3 per cent, and we are confronted with the statement that we are outraging the people by authorizing the sale of a bond, and we are told that the people will do so and so, that the people will respond to our action by their verdict.

We must remember that the people are calmly seated at home considering this question in the light of their own firesides. We must remember that the judgment of the people will be made up upon the actual facts and not according to the excitements of the moment to-night. The people's judgment is formed not from the crest of the topmost wave, nor from the lowest depths between the waves, but from the level of the great ocean of calm thought. They will approve our action when we do that which is wise in maintaining the credit and honor of our country. If we authorize the sale of a bond for 3 per cent, does anybody suppose that the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury would dare to advertise a 4 per cent bond?

Do any men fear, as expressed here by some Republicans and Democrats alike, that the Secretary of the Treasury, if this bill passes, will retire all the greenbacks? Think but a moment of what you talk about. Do you suppose any Secretary of the Treasury dare risk his own reputation, dare risk the safety of his own party, by piling up a surplus in the Treasury in the form of greenbacks and then issue these exchequer certificates and sell them on interest? Do you suppose anybody dare do that? But the very bill itself provides for the sale of bonds only to protect the gold reserve and that which is equivalent to it.

Do you suppose any Secretary of the Treasury dare do more than that? We must confer ample authority on the Secretary of the Treasury, and then hold him to a strict responsibility for his action. Give him no power, and when a wave strikes us we go to pieces. Give him ample power and hold him responsible, and then we will learn, as we have learned in the past, that the business of our country is secure. Give him power to sell these bonds at 3 per cent, and he dare not undertake to sell a bond at a rate above that until he has failed to sell 3 per cent bonds; nor dare he sell a bond when the gold reserve is intact.

No Secretary dare risk the honor and safety of his party by undertaking to sell a million dollars in bonds when the gold reserve is intact. No Secretary of the Treasury dare undertake to hoard greenbacks and sell certificates or bonds when the greenbacks are there ready to be paid out. There is no danger in that respect. There would be no hoarding of greenbacks nor selling of bonds except such as the exigency might require. What we propose to do to-night is to authorize the issue and sale of 3 per cent bonds at a lower rate and for a shorter time than the Republicans authorized the issue and sale of bonds in 1875.

Does anybody suppose that the people will not ratify the action of Congress in that direction? If we save anything in the shape of interest and the length of time, do you suppose they will not ratify our action? The people will not stand by patiently and see us authorize the sale of bonds to bring ruin on the Treasury. This bill carefully excludes that idea. Certificates are only to be sold to bridge over the temporary necessities of the Treasury. Gentlemen over here are greatly afraid that what we are doing in this respect will be wrong.

Well, now, gentlemen on the other side, you need have no fear. If you have got this world of money in the Treasury, $77,000,000, that you talk of, with your own Executive for the next year and three or four months, you need not be afraid that any of these exchequer certificates will be sold. You tell us that there is plenty of money there. If so, there is no danger of the sale of certificates. Your Secretary of the Treasury will not sell them, and I assert, with history before us, that a Republican Secretary of the Treasury will not do it. Then where is there any danger? What we want to do is to provide ample power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep intact the gold reserve, to keep afloat the greenback, and then provide revenue from custom-house collections, as our Democratic friends have declared we should provide to pay the running expenses of this Government, and come back to where we stood from 1879 down to 1893, when no person presented a greenback for redemption in gold, when the credit of our Government was intact, and when all countries recognized the credit of this Government as being first class.

Now, let me say to you, do not undertake to bring politics and partisan feeling into a matter like this; for while we are discussing these matters we may be allowing the interests of our country to suffer, and the interests of our country ought to be cared for outside of politics and President making. I care nothing who shall be President, only so that he is a Republican, for I dare trust any Republican in that direction. [Laughter and applause.] Let us leave politics outside and look at this matter on business principles and as business men, and not do that which is destructive to the interests of our country. We may be doing that by refusing to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury such power.

We may be doing that which is absolutely ruinous to us. We may be planting seed which in some far-off harvest year will be filled with ruin to our country. We must remember that in the moral, the political, and the financial world there is a seedtime and a harvest, as there is in the physical world. We go forth in the physical world and scatter seed, and we know when we are to expect to reap the golden harvest; but in the moral, the political, and the financial world we know that while a man may go forth and scatter the seed, nobody but God alone knows what the harvest will be. Let us plant to the safety and the honor of our country, and not to its dishonor.

Let us provide the means for protecting the safety, the honor of our country, and then trust to the people, where we dare trust, for the people finally are always right. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. TARSNEY withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, representing a district almost entirely agricultural, living in a city with almost 15,000 laboring men, I have looked at this bill and analyzed it from the standpoint of my relations to my own district as a part of our common country; and studiously investigating the bill in all of its provisions I have reached these conclusions as to what it accomplishes: In the first place, the bill does not require the issuance of bonds; second, it reduces the rate of interest if the issuance of bonds is made necessary at any time; third, it leaves the bonds with our own people and avoids putting us in the power of foreigners, and at great expense to the country; fourth, it does not retire the greenbacks, but does put it in the power of the Government to put the greenbacks out of the hands of Wall street and the raiders on the Government credit; fifth, it reproves the present Administration for selling bonds under the guise of keeping intact the coin reserve and in fact using the proceeds of the bonds to pay current expenses. It sets apart the proceeds of the bonds to protect the coin reserve and clothes the Treasury with power to secure ample funds for Government expenses; sixth, if the Executive desires to vault and tie up the greenbacks, he can do so now, under the act of 1878, and at great expense to the people of the country; seventh, and in conclusion, it reduces the rates of interest. It insures ample funds for Government expenses. It insures us against any depreciation of any of our money. It averts a financial crash and will secure stability for labor and capital. This bill, added to the one passed on yesterday, will secure funds for all purposes, will avert the issuance of bonds, and end the temptation to speculate on any of the people's money.

I say to my Republican associates, I appeal to them, to let the great interests of this country, in every part of it, know and feel sure that when the Republican party steps into power, it comes like a young athlete, strong and ready to grapple with the existing troubles and to devote itself fearlessly under all circumstances to the welfare of all our people. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, one of the principal objections to the passage of this bill is that, in effect, it will retire the legal-tender notes of the United States from circulation.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds arising from the sale of the bonds therein authorized for the redemption of the United States legal-tender notes, "and for no other purpose."

The chairman of the committee that framed this bill has interpreted the meaning of the words "for no other purpose." He says that the intention of the committee was to prevent the Administration from using the legal-tender notes after they are redeemed for the ordinary expenses of the Government, that the account of the redemption fund must be kept separate from the expense account of the Government, and that the redemption fund can not be used to meet deficiencies in the revenue.

How, then, under this bill, can the greenbacks, after they are once redeemed by the Treasury, again be put in circulation? It is generally conceded by those who have spoken in favor of the passage of this bill that it can only be done by purchasing outstanding bonds of the Government.

Even if that policy were carried out it would be a queer spectacle to see the Government sell bonds for redemption of greenbacks and then buy other unmatured bonds at a premium in order to again put the redeemed money in circulation.

But the policy of buying bonds in order to put in circulation the redeemed legal-tender notes would never be carried out. We know the attitude of the present Administration upon this subject. Secretary Carlisle, in his speech at the Boston banquet in November last, declared emphatically that the policy of the Government should be to retire all the outstanding legal-tender notes. That declaration foreshadowed the message of the President, which was read in this House three weeks ago, and which reiterated the same financial policy. In view of these declarations, how can it be seriously contended that, at least during the present Administration, a single bond will be purchased by the redeemed greenbacks in order to again put them in circulation?

After a policy is once adopted by the Treasury Department we know how strenuously it would be urged that a change of policy would unsettle existing conditions and weaken confidence.

There can be no evading the conclusion that if this bill becomes a law there will be locked in the vaults of the Treasury every legal-tender note that is redeemed by the Government.

Do you fully comprehend what is meant by retiring the greenbacks? The drain on the gold in the Treasury is for foreign shipment. This gold can only be obtained by redeeming legal-tender notes. By the redemption of legal-tender notes we lose not only the gold currency so withdrawn for foreign shipment, but we lose also from circulation the legal-tender notes so redeemed and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury. This double system of retiring our circulating medium would, if a large quantity of legal-tender notes were redeemed, produce such a rapid contraction of the currency as would produce a panic far more disastrous than the panic of 1893. Thus by this bill, instead of averting a panic, you are actually creating one.

The advocates of this measure say that, as the Secretary of the Treasury is already vested with the power to issue bonds to maintain the gold reserve, this bill is only intended to authorize a better bond. Better in what? It is answered, in making them short-time obligations and decreasing the rate of interest. Let us examine these contentions for a moment.

It is a recognized financial truth that the longer time a bond has to run the better price it will bring in the market. If the state of the market were such that a thirty-year 3 per cent bond would sell at par, it would be difficult, indeed, for a five-year 4 per cent bond to sell at any premium whatever.

So it is questionable, even if it were necessary to issue bonds, whether they should be short-time obligations.

It is also a well-known fact in financial circles that the rate of interest named in a Government bond is practically immaterial. If money in the market for United States Government bonds is worth only 3 per cent, then the amount which will be bid for a bond bearing a higher rate of interest will be such a premium as will make it a 3 per cent investment. It therefore appears that the advantages claimed for the bonds authorized by this measure are practically no advantages at all.

It seems remarkable to me that anyone should advocate the retirement of noninterest-bearing obligations by the substitution of interest-bearing bonds.

There are now in existence about $500,000,000 in United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and United States Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act. The Government is now saving annually at least 3 per cent on that amount, namely $15,000,000, by keeping the notes outstanding. To substitute bonds for these notes would require the payment of at least that much per annum besides contracting the currency to an alarming degree. The cost of keeping up the gold reserve, even if it were wise to do so, would not exceed one-third of that amount.

The people of the United States are opposed to the issuance of any bonds in times of peace. No act of any Administration has ever been more universally condemned than that of the present Administration in issuing bonds, and yet by the passage of this bill we are giving to President Cleveland a vote of confidence.

The difficulty with the situation is not that we have too many legal-tender notes in circulation, but that the base upon which we have built our monetary system is too small to support the superstructure.

The money of ultimate redemption in most of the countries of the world is gold alone. The demands that are consequently made upon that metal are enormous indeed. The nations are almost in a death struggle among themselves over the small quantity of gold in existence. The United States, in order to maintainher gold reserve, has been issuing bonds and buying gold therewith in Europe. The Bank of England, by high rates of exchange, has been trying to prevent the exportation of gold. Austria has been grabbing for gold in order to resume specie payments on that basis. Germany has been guarding with vigilance her gold reserve. France, by her system of paying half in gold and half in silver, prevents the withdrawal of gold from her Treasury. It has recently been estimated that Russia, for war purposes, has accumulated in her treasury nearly $1,000,000,000 in gold. The accumulation of this vast sum by Russia is practically a withdrawal of it from circulation in the world. Russia is on an inconvertible paper-money basis, and hence needs little or none of it for circulation.

Every effort that each nation makes to acquire or retain gold acts as an increased demand for gold, and consequently increases the value thereof.

As gold is the unit or measure of value, its increase in value can only be ascertained in its increased purchasing power, and that can only be ascertained in the decline of the price of everything that gold will buy. It is this increased value of gold that has made all products and other property decline in price.

The only way to relieve the strain on gold and prevent the continual increase in its value is by adding to our monetary system another primary money which will bear its share of the burdens of commerce and credit and enlarge the base upon which all credit money is founded. Nature has designed only one other metal for that purpose by giving it qualities of indestructibility and density, together with limitation of quantity, and that is silver.

The sooner the Government realizes that it must restore silver to its time-honored position as standard money the sooner it will ascertain the true cause of its financial difficulties and the true road to national prosperity and wealth.

These organized raids that are being made upon the Treasury can all be stopped by the Government offering to redeem its notes one-half in gold and one-half in silver, as does France. There is no danger that a single legal-tender note or silver dollar will go to a discount by such action.

It is estimated that there are over $20,000,000,000 of debts owing in the United States, and that more than half of the same, besides taxes, are payable in lawful money. The minute that any legal-tender money should go to a discount of even one-half of 1 per cent, that minute all the persons owing obligations payable in lawful money would create an enormous demand for the same, and that very demand would immediately restore its value. Financiers would foresee the effect of such a demand and hence no discount would occur.

By this action the gold would remain in the Treasury and there would be no necessity for the issuance of interest-bearing obligations or of the passage of this measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCCORMICK, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBERT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BRUMM, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. SAUERHERING, until January 8, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. LOCKHART, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. RANEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORSE, for one week, on account of important business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 28, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday was read and approved.

BONDS AND CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The House, under the order adopted yesterday, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the House that in the allotment of time thus far those in opposition to the bill have consumed so much that of their time there is remaining one hour, and to the other side there remain two hours; but the Chair thinks there has been some misapprehension with regard to it, and perhaps, if there is no objection on the part of the House, a fair division of the time would be an hour and forty minutes in favor of the bill, and the remainder to the other side, if that is satisfactory. The Chair would be very glad if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] would assume control of the time in opposition, as the Chair understands some arrangements have been made of that sort. Or if the gentleman from Georgia will make some indication to the Chair, the Chair will give recognition accordingly. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. BROSIUS].

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, our present situation is full of difficulty. The Treasury of the United States is in distress. The white flag is out. This Congress can not afford to pass by on the other side like the priest and Levite. We must render help, and do it speedily. It doesn't matter what misadventure caused the dilemma or by what route we arrived in the Dismal Swamp of our distress. It is our plain duty to get out of it as speedily as possible. Such a situation must make every member of this House sensible of the claims his country has upon him to assist—at least not to hinder—legislation calculated to afford relief.

Two propositions relating to the measure before the House seem to me to be fundamental and indisputable. We must maintain our gold reserve and we must provide the means of meeting the current expenses of the Government. On these two propositions there can be no controversy on this floor. We only arrive on the field of contention when we come to consider the mode of carrying out these propositions. In respect to the gold reserve, it may be said that the situation of the Treasury of the United States under our system is singularly unique. I think it is the only place where gold redemption is absolutely compulsory without qualification or limitation. It is the only custodian of gold on the face of the earth, that I know of, which is without the means of resisting incursions from foreign claimants or domestic speculators or hoarders. Its necessities compel it to surrender its gold on demand without means of replenishing the supply. As the stock diminishes the rush increases to get what remains, for a shrinkage in the reserve below what we are educated to regard as the apprehensive limit, namely, $100,000,000, clouds the credit of the notes that rest upon it and causes doubt and distrust in the public mind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious to every reflecting mind that we must replenish the gold reserve or suspend gold payments. There are but two ways known to any honest Government of obtaining gold or any other form of money—namely, by some form of taxation or by employing the credit of the Government to obtain money by borrowing. We have already availed ourselves of the former—the usual and ordinary method of obtaining revenue by the passage of the emergency revenue measure the other day; and, if our expectations of the success of that measure are not disappointed, it may be that we will not be required to have recourse to any considerable extent to any other measure; for it is the deliberate conviction of a large majority of this House and of the people of the United States whom we represent that the deficiency in the revenue of the Government is the chief sinner in the comedy of errors which has brought this country to its present unhappy condition. It is our conviction that the revenue deficit and the gold depletion are twin mischiefs. More than that, they are Siamese twins. One will live as long as the other survives. Kill the deficit, and gold depletion will instantly expire. [Applause.]

Nor is this the opinion of Republicans alone. Distinguished Democratic organs have declared the same view. The New York World of November 23 last said editorially:

The simple truth is that the gold reserve runs down as often as it is replenished because the revenues of the Government are not equal to its expenditures. The Treasury is paying out more than it receives, and is forced to make good the deficiency by borrowing. That is the fundamental fact in the case. The only permanent remedy is to be found in making the revenues equal to the demands upon the Treasury.

On December 4 the same paper said editorially:

There remains, however, the experience of fifteen years to suggest that if revenues were adequate the gold reserve would take care of itself. From 1879 to 1892 it did so.

And on December 7 it said:

The World has shown from the President's own figures that the repeated depletions of the gold reserve were compelled by a lack of adequate revenue; that more than a hundred millions of the gold got by the sale of bonds was used in paying current expenses, and that if the bonds had not been sold the Government would not have had money enough to meet its bills. We add now that the Secretary of the Treasury has himself borne witness to all this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just at this point it occurs to me to allude to a singular omission in the discussion the other day on the emergency revenue measure. We could not fail to note that none of the debaters appealed to the lamp of experience; no one turned on the light of history to illumine our pathway. This was a distinct loss to the discussion, for in this instance that light possesses a very high illuminating power. The history of deficits in the United States is very interesting and exceedingly instructive. I can not now allude to it with a view of forming the conviction which impelled the passage of the act the other day, though I may refer to it for the purpose of increasing the satisfaction with which we contemplate that action.

This is the third notable revenue deficit in this country in time of peace, and every one of them was produced by the same cause—that is, the ill-advised reduction of customs duties. And, singularly enough, every one of them was followed by similar consequences in one or another degree, and in every instance the situation was relieved by the enactment of a tariff bill. Let us look for a moment at the history of our revenue deficits.

Under the operation of the compromise tariff act of 1833, which provided for the scaling down of import duties, there was such falling off of revenue that by 1840 the Treasury was empty. A deficit existed for the first time in our history in time of peace, and it brought financial disaster, as it always does. To meet the difficulty a special session of Congress was convened in June, 1841, and President Tyler, in his message, said that by March 4, 1842, there would be a deficit of $11,406,132, and a further deficit by September, 1842, of $4,845,000. In his message of December, 1841, he reported a still further shortage, and declared that these accumulated deficits were the results of the great reduction of import duties by the legislation of 1833.

In 1842 an act was passed entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government." That was the tariff act of 1842. Under this act revenues revived. In a short time a surplus reappeared and financial troubles were conspicuous by their absence until the next revenue deficit occurred, which was in Buchanan's Administration. From 1843 to 1857 the revenue was adequate to meet expenditures, but in the latter year an act was passed so reducing the duties on imports that the revenue became totally inadequate to meet current expenses, and the second deficit in our history in time of peace occurred and continued increasing until the beginning of Lincoln's Administration. The growth of this deficit is an interesting study. The student of American finance will find by perusing the records of that Administration that on July 1, 1857, the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, was $11,350,270. On July 1, 1860, it was $61,140,497, showing a deficit of $50,000,000 in three years. By the time Lincoln was inaugurated the debt reached $90,000,000, and the deficit amounted to $70,000,000. Now, what was the condition of the country at that time in respect to finances and business? President Buchanan, in his annual message to Congress December 8, 1857, said:

We have possessed all the elements of national wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

In the same message, after describing the distress and want to which the people had been reduced, President Buchanan enlarged upon the inability of the people to purchase manufactured articles for lack of means, and that goods therefore ceased to be produced. The decay of our own industries so lessened the people's means of purchasing imported goods that imports fell off to such an extent that the revenue declined so that it was inadequate to meet the necessary expenses of the Government. To supply this deficiency Congress, by act of December 23, 1857, authorized the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. This proving inadequate, in June, 1858, a loan of $20,000,000 was authorized to meet the expenditures of the Government.

The conditions progressed from bad to worse until March 3, 1859, when the situation was so appalling that the President issued a special message to Congress, appealing in tones of touching pathos to preserve the credit of the country.

The Treasury was bankrupt, the credit of the nation was reduced to its lowest terms, and no provision was made for the necessary expenses of the Government.

Thus—

Says the message—

the country, which is full of resources, will be dishonored before the world, and the American people, who are a debt-paying people, will be disgraced by the omission on our part to do our duty.

This statement of the character of our distresses and the condition of our counrty in the Administration of James Buchanan could be truthfully applied to the Administration of Grover Cleveland without change save that of date. But the conditions of the country in the two periods are not more identical than are the causes which produced them.

Under this Administration another onslaught was made upon customs duties, and history has repeated itself. The deficit has already reached the alarming sum of $133,000,000, with a prospect of continuance.

But we have not relied wholly on the revenue measure already enacted. We propose a recourse to other means of relieving the difficulty. Someone says we already have the power to borrow money. Yes, but we want the power to borrow in a suitable fashion, conformably to the interests of the people. I do not think it a suitable way to borrow money to farm out the Treasury of the United States to European gold jockeys. It is not a suitable way, in my judgment, to employ the sleuthhounds of a joint foreign and American syndicate to hunt down gold to replenish our reserves. There is one suitable means, and that is to borrow what we need from our own people at the lowest rate obtainable. The popular character of this measure is one of its most attractive features. The people of the United States, in my judgment, ought to have the first opportunity to take every obligation of this Government in the negotiation of loans. If our people held to-day all of our indebtedness I doubt if the country would be in the trough of the financial sea as we are to-day. The interest that we are compelled to pay to the holders of our bonds abroad constitutes a foreign liability which is a burden upon the people whenever there is an adverse balance of trade that we must meet whether our gold is in the vaults of the Treasury of the United States or in those of the banks. France, with her fabulous debt of $4,000,000,000, finds no inconvenience in handling that debt, because it is owned and held by her own people.

So that if there was nothing else in this measure to commend it, the fact that it secured two distinct advantages not possessed by the present law—the low rate of interest and the giving to our own people the right to hold this indebtedness—pleads, it seems to me, trumpet-tongued in favor of the pending measure.

I have heard some apprehension expressed that this bill would operate to contract the currency by retaining the greenbacks in the Treasury. This does not seem to me a practical difficulty. I am quite willing that a limited amount of our greenback currency should be retained in the Treasury temporarily if it will afford relief in the present situation. Any contraction of the currency arising therefrom would be immediately supplied by the national banks, and when the relief measures have done their work and our financial ship is righted the accumulated greenbacks could be used in payment of any Government indebtedness, and they would then be as incapable of harm as they were for fifteen years after the resumption of specie payment.

It is obvious to everyone that to go on borrowing gold to meet an endless drain would be as vain a task as that of the daughters of Danaus, doomed to draw water from a well and pour it eternally into a perforated cask. Such a process of redeeming notes that are never redeemed is not consonant with reason, and if there was to be no end to it it would be necessary to dispose of the greenbacks at once by redemption and cancellation and thus kill what has been termed the auriferous tapeworm that wriggles back and forth between Wall street or London and the Treasury of the United States.

I am now, as I always have been, and as I declared on this floor in the debate on the bond bill in the Fifty-third Congress, opposed to the cancellation of the greenbacks, excepting in so far as it may be absolutely necessary to afford relief from present distress. The people of the United States will not consent that five hundred millions of noninterest-bearing shall be converted into an equal amount of interest-bearing debt.

The last section in this bill will hardly admit of anything being said in its favor, because it is so manifestly in the line of public interest and public economy. Every Government, I suppose, on the face of the earth has lodged with it the power, when exigencies arise, to replenish its funds by a temporary loan by certificates of indebtedness or consols or something of that character, and we would have conferred this authority long ago upon the Secretary of the Treasury if we had ever anticipated the need of such a recourse. But in the plenitude of our ready money we never anticipated the possibility of needing to resort to temporary means of meeting emergencies of this kind.

But now the situation is changed and new occasions bring new duties. Our calamities are now our teachers and admonish us of the wisdom of no longer neglecting in health the sanitary precautions that may serve us in sickness.

I see no other way to succor the distressed Treasury than by the measures proposed, and this Congress is pledged to afford relief. It holds a commission which commands this duty. It was summoned distinctly for this purpose. It was elected to guard the Republic against further injury, to restore duties improperly taken off, to reinstate the specific basis of duties, and save the many millions of revenue lost by undervaluation under the ad valorem system. This is the mandate of the people of the United States and it must be obeyed. It can not be disobeyed without dishonor. That we are surrounded with difficulties which obstruct us in our duty will not excuse us for omitting proper effort to acquit ourselves of the obligations laid upon us. That other branches of the Government may fail to suitably meet their responsibilities will not absolve us from the obligation to meet ours.

I do not doubt that the circumstances in which a divided Government has placed us may to some extent limit our obligations and relieve us from duties which under other circumstances would lay heavily upon us. Legislation clearly within the commission we hold, and, had we a united Government, would be as clearly within our duty, must be postponed for the present. The inutility of attempting what can not succeed will be our warrant for inaction when action could not avail. But measures which are obviously necessary, that are imperiously demanded to relieve necessities which are pressing with extreme urgency and which the Constitution requires shall originate in this House, must be considered and passed at the earliest day practicable. In other words, the necessities of the hour measure our duty.

Now, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no politics whatever in this measure. The motive of this legislation contains but two ingredients—patriotism and business. The President of the United States has appealed to this House for succor to a distressed Treasury. It does not matter, it seems to me, that he has blundered in the diagnosis of the case and recommends a wrong remedy. Let us give the patient the right one. The doctor who would withhold a suitable prescription from a suffering patient because a quack had recommended a wrong one would hardly be worthy of his profession. Neither is there any occasion to canvass and dispute about the delinquencies of the Democratic party and their relation to the distresses of the country. I admit that they are great, that they are colossal—monumental. But what has that to do with the question of our duty to the country in the exigency that confronts us? The surgeon in diagnosing a gunshot wound does not need to know whether the gun was discharged by accident or design; the treatment is the same in either case. There are some things I am sure we can not afford to do merely for a party advantage. We can not afford to harm the country to help the party. We must be patriots before we are partisans.

There is but one word to-day that can express the supreme and overruling inspiration of this hour, and that word is "patriotism." There is but one word that can denote the action which that overruling inspiration commands, and that word is "duty." If we are insensible to the one or disobedient to the other, we are sure to convict ourselves of recreancy to a great public duty, and we can not expect to escape the sentence of dishonor.

Let us, therefore, legislate up to date. Let us pass this measure and afford suitable relief as far as we can under the circumstances in which we are placed by the misfortune of a divided Government.

After we have done wnat we can to effect this purpose and fail by reason of difficulties we have not the power to overcome, our effort to perform will be accepted as performance, and we will be acquitted by the people of the United States, and the responsibility will be placed where it rightfully belongs.

When our supremacy in the Government is complete and our power unhindered by Executive obstruction, it will be our duty to repeal or materially modify that destructive piece of legislation from which the President withheld his signature because it was not bad enough to escape the imputation of "perfidy and dishonor," to reorganize our monetary system as rapidly as time and experience reveal defects until we have as perfect a financial system as the wisdom of man can devise, to formulate and maintain a foreign policy which shall be as broad-gauged as our nationality, with a firmness equal to our national self-respect, with a dignity commensurate with our preeminence among nations, and with a contempt for bluster, bravado, and jingoism as profound as our country is great. This salutary work in the fullness of time will be done, and wisely done, by that great party which enjoys the preeminence of never having betrayed a trust or broken a pledge or deceived the people or denied its master from the day it followed the leadership of the glorious old Pathfinder to honorable defeat, through all its years of devotion and toil and victory down to this auspicious hour, when the people, recovering the dominion of reason and rejudging the judgment of 1892, call it again into confidence and favor, place the laurel upon its brow, the reins of power in its hands, and bid it guide the Republic through wise government into the pathway that leads to the sweet pastures of prosperity and the still waters of peace and plenty. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

What has been said in the course of this debate in advocacy of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 does not seem to bear a very close relation to the subject of "bonds" and "revenue"; yet it may have a remote connection with it. As the free coinage of silver under existing conditions, by the United States alone, would lead directly to silver monometallism, I desire to submit for the consideration of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] and others of his way of thinking who are interested in the inquiry, whether our money unit under the act of 1792 was based upon one or both metals, the results of a study of that subject from its historical side; with a review of the arguments of the fathers who laid the foundations of our monetary system and who did not favor the idea of silver monometallism. I could not, of course, do this in the time at my command, but it will answer the same purpose to extend my remarks under the rule, and I will avail myself of the privilege.

Whether the money unit contemplated by the coinage act of 1792 was based on both metals or on one only may not be of great practical importance to-day, yet as a link in the chain of our monetary history, and as a subject of historical research commanding no inconsiderable attention at this time, it has value enough to warrant a desire to be right in our conclusions concerning it. In the interest of historic truth, therefore, and for no other purpose, I desire to bring into distinct review the acts and the arguments of the fathers of that day who had most to do with the establishment of our monetary system relating to the vexed question of our money unit. The data which such a review will supply may be useful in guarding against error, and in aiding those who are pursuing the inquiry to arrive at conclusions upon which an honest mind can rest with satisfaction.

WHAT IS A "MONEY UNIT"?

It may be desirable at the outset to try to have an intelligent notion of the meaning of the expression "money unit," about which much may be said without making it clear; and, indeed, when we come to define it, the less we say the less we are likely to obscure it. Some of the difficulty would no doubt vanish if we avoided confounding the abstract and the concrete contents of the expression. A numerical unit is a pure abstraction. It is expressed by a figure. We manipulate figures without respect to commodities of any kind. We can say three times three are nine without considering the concrete denotement of the numbers. It may be one or more of anything you choose, as one dollar or one apple. A numerical unit is not a creature of the law, but of the mind. A single thing is one by nature and not by legal enactment. So we can not reach the legal contents of the expression "money unit" from the merely numerical side.

When we advance a step toward the reality and add to the numerical abstraction the word "dollar," we have a concrete unit. Every unit of measure or weight or value must be a concrete unit; a unit expressed by a determinate amount or quantity or weight of the thing to be measured or weighed or estimated, to be taken as a standard of comparison for other determinate amounts, quantities, or weight of like kind, and without which no kind of exchange but primitive barter could take place.

A money unit then contains this group of ideas, namely:

First. A numerical abstraction—a symbol for purposes of notation.

Second. A determinate weight of precious metal or metals, as the case may be, which is fixed by law.

Third. The denomination "dollar," also a creature of the law, which expresses the value of the predetermined weight of precious metal which constitutes the unit.

The value inheres in the metal and not in the form of it. A certain number of grains of gold or silver in the form of a cube are just as effectually a unit of value as if in the form of a disk, for value resides in substance and not in form.

The struck coin is a thing apart. It is not the "money unit," but a thing of convenience in exchange, a certificate of weight and fineness. If it coincides with the unit in value, that is an incident which gives it no character different from other coins excepting in denomination. The unit, as a mere symbol, is only the money of the mind. The struck coin is the piece for payment, and contains the value which its name expresses. The former is in view when a contract of sale is made; the latter only comes into requisition when it is executed. One is for the arithmetic of exchange, to afford terms in which values can be expressed; the other is to effect exchanges of commodities whose value has been reduced to expression in the terms of the unit.

We have thus arrived at our definition of "money unit," namely, a given number of grains of precious metal possessing a determinate value, named "dollar" or "unit," by comparison with which the denominations of money are regulated, and in the terms of which, or the fractions or multiples thereof, general values are expressed.

THE FIELD OF DISCUSSION.

The field over which the discussion of the fathers ranged embraces several distinct inquiries:

First. "What should be the unit of value?"

Second. "Whether it should be based on one metal or both?"

Third. "Whether it should be represented by a coin of corresponding value?"

Fourth. "What coins should be struck to express values in the uses to which money was to be put?"

Each of these questions had distinct consideration and decision. The difficulties encountered by the Colonies and the Confederation, on account of the confused state of their money, were distinctly before the minds of the fathers when, under the Federal regime, they took up the subject of our money for deliberate and determinate treatment. Foreign coins of gold and silver were current in the country; their value varied in different States, and to know the meaning of "a pound" or "a shilling" you had to know what State you were in.

The Spanish silver dollar had, it is said, at least five different values in as many sections of the country. McMaster tells us it was not unusual for a traveler to pay bills with silver dollars in Boston at 6s. the dollar; the next week in New York at 8s.; some days later in Philadelphia at 7s. 6d., and still later at 32s. 6d. at Charleston. Gold, it seems, was not subject to so much variation. The value of the gold pieces expressed in dollars was pretty much the same the country over, and 24¾ grains of gold corresponded very nearly with the nominal value of the Spanish silver dollar in all the States.

Another cause of confusion was the clipping of the coin, which had been carried to such an extent that Washington suggested that before long every man would have to travel with a pair of balances in his pocket, or run the risk of being cheated. In such a state of monetary chaos it is little wonder that the people began to look to Congress for succor and that committees were appointed to consider and report upon suitable means of unifying the money of the country.

ROBERT MORRIS ON THE UNIT.

Confronted by the necessity thus presented of a suitable monetary system for the new Government, and instructed by the experience of the past, the fathers came to the consideration of the subject. The report of Robert Morris to Congress on a coinage scheme, made on January 15, 1782, was the first contribution of great value to the discussion of that day. That report, though it bore the name of Robert, is believed to have been wrought out chiefly by Gouverneur Morris. By way of preliminary, he observed the happiness we derived from unity in our system of weights and measures throughout America, and noted the advantages we enjoyed from having throughout the Union the same ideas of a mile and an inch, a hogshead and a quart, a pound and an ounce. But with respect to our money he lamented that the case was widely different, and that the ideas annexed to a pound, shilling, and penny were as various as the States themselves, rendering calculation a prerequisite to every commercial exchange. He then takes up the chief inquiry which concerns us in this paper, namely, "Whether the money unit should be affixed to both metals or to one only?" After comparing the merits of the metals and the arguments for and against each, he says:

There can be no doubt, therefore, that our money standard ought to be affixed to silver.

The argument that led up to this conclusion was that the scale by which everything is to be measured ought to be fixed as the nature of things will permit of. And a money standard affixed to both metals would not afford a fixed and certain scale, because if affixed to both it would in reality be affixed to neither—

For—

He says—

the demand which commerce might make for either of the precious metals in preference to the other would vary this real standard from time to time, and in every payment a man would get more or less of real value for his debt, according as he was paid in the coin of greater or less value in relation to the real standard.

Mr. Morris next considers what the "money unit" should be. He says:

The purposes of commerce require that the lowest divisible point of money, or what is more properly called the "money unit," should be very small, but there is no necessity that the unit be exactly represented in coin. It is sufficient that its value be precisely known.

This makes it quite clear that in his mind there was a distinction between the "money unit" and the sensible object which was to represent it.

Advancing his argument on this line, Mr. Morris says:

The money unit will be equal to a quarter of a grain of fine silver in coined money. Proceeding, then, in a decimal ratio, 100 would be the lowest silver coin, and might be called a cent, while the dollar, which contains about 373 grains of fine silver at the mint price, would be 1,440 units.

He does not propose the coinage of any piece of that name, but all current coins are to be rated to silver at a mint price, established at 22,237 units per pound. The great merit he claimed for his unit was that all the currencies of the States were reducible to it without a remainder.

MORRIS'S CONCLUSIONS.

The points distinctly made by Mr. Morris and to be carried with us in the further progress of the discussion are: First, that a money unit affixed to both metals could not be stable and certain; second, that the money unit should be attached to silver alone; third, that no coin need be struck to correspond with the money unit.

THOMAS JEFFERSON'S VIEWS.

The next important contribution to the discussion is "Thomas Jefferson's notes on the establishment of a money unit and of a coinage for the United States." These notes, it appears, were communicated to Congress simultaneously with Mr. Morris's report in 1782. Mr. Jefferson objected to Mr. Morris's money unit because it was too small, holding that the one thousand four hundred and fortieth part of a dollar as a unit would be inconvenient in commerce. He says:

It is inconvenient in its application to ordinary money transactions. The price of a loaf of bread, one-twentieth of a dollar, would be 72 units. A pound of butter, one-fifth of a dollar, would be 288 units. Ten thousand dollars would reqire eight figures, to wit, 14,400,000. A horse or bullock of $80 value would require a notation of six figures, to wit, 115,200 units.

Nowhere in his notes does Mr. Jefferson make any objection to the plan of Mr. Morris on the ground of there being no coined piece to correspond with the unit of value. He assented, also, to the suggestion that it was not essential that a coin be struck to correspond with the money unit. The decimal ratio, he thought, was ingenious and admirable.

In considering the unit of money he says:

Three circumstances are of principal importance:

"First. That it be of a convenient size to be applied as a measure to the common money transactions of life.

"Second. That its parts and multiples be an easy proportion to each other, so as to facilitate the money arithmetic.

"Third. That the 'unit' and its parts or divisions be so nearly of the value of some of the known coins as that they may be of easy adoption for the people."

It will be seen that in this enumeration of the important requisites of a "money unit" no mention is made of the metal in which the "unit" is to be represented. Gold would answer all the requirements equally with silver. He, however, goes on to say, "The Spanish dollar seems to fulfill all these conditions." His reasoning in support of this observation may be summarized as follows:

1. As a common measure it is of convenient size.
2. The value of any amount up to $10,000 is easily estimated by the mind, so also that of the tenth or hundredth of a dollar; and few transactions are above or below these limits.
3. It coincides in value with some of the known coins so nearly that the people can quickly estimate their value.
4. The dollar is a known coin and the most familiar of all to the mind of the people.

It will be observed that none of these reasons turn upon the metal out of which the unit is to be coined, and no preference is indicated on the ground of any intrinsic or even sentimental superiority of silver over gold. There is no suggestion that silver was the money of the poor and gold the money of the rich; no suggestion of a conflict of interests between Wall street and the rural districts, between the banker and the farmer; no thought expressed of favoring one metal by attaching the unit to it, or that men "desiring to injure business by making money scarce could not so easily get hold of all the silver and hide it away as they could gold." The era of the demagogue had not yet come in.

JEFFERSON'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

In concluding his notes Mr. Jefferson submits the following recommendations:

That the money unit of these States shall be equal in value to a Spanish milled dollar; that it shall be divided into tenths and hundredths; that there shall be a coin of silver of the value of the unit, another of the same metal of the value of one-tenth of a unit, one other of copper of the value of one-hundredth of a unit; that there shall be a coin of gold of the value of ten units.

In a supplementary paper he says:

My proposition, then, is that our notation of money shall be decimal; that the unit of this notation shall be a dollar; that coin shall be accommodated to it from $10 to the hundredth of a dollar.

JEFFERSON'S CONCLUSIONS.

Remembering, for the purpose of comparison, the conclusions of Mr. Morris, those of Mr. Jefferson may be summed up thus:

First. That the minuteness of Mr. Morris's money unit was not desirable, though the decimal ratio was admirable.
Second. That the unit should be of the value of the Spanish milled dollar, and that a piece should be coined to correspond with it.
Third. That the money unit should be based on both metals.

In view of the foregoing, it seems difficult to conceive how any other conclusion is deducible from Jefferson's notes than that he believed that the money unit should be based on both metals. But happily he did not leave the matter there. In his letter to Hamilton of February, 1792, he says:

I will return you the report on the unit, which I have read over with a great deal of satisfaction. I concur with you in thinking that the unit must stand on both metals.

Morris found grave objections to Jefferson's recommendations. He thought they provided a money unsuitable to the wants of the people; that the dollar was more nearly related to the British money than to our own currency; emphasizing his objection by the suggestion that you might as well select for American farmers a scythe used among the Alps instead of one suitable to our own fields.

VIEWS OF THE GRAND COMMITTEE.

The next contribution to the discussion in consecutive order was the report to Congress of what was called the "Grand Committee on the Money Unit," in 1785. In this report the divergent views were considered and the conclusions of Mr. Jefferson adopted. They recommend the "dollar" as the money unit on the distinct grounds that the people were familiar with the value of a "dollar"; that it had been in general use and would conform to the national mode of keeping accounts.

On July 6, 1785, Congress received the report of the grand committee, and on the resolution "That the money unit of the United States of America be one dollar," the yeas and nays were called, and every member answered "yea."

BOARD OF TREASURY REPORT.

On the 8th of April, 1786, the Board of Treasury reported to Congress their conclusions on the expediency of a mint for the coinage of American money.

In their report they recommended a "silver dollar" as the money unit. In August, 1786, Congress adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the money unit of the United States, being by the resolve of Congress of the 6th of July, 1785, a dollar, shall contain of fine silver 375.64 grains.

After providing for the coinage of the dollar as the highest silver coin, and the divisions thereof, halves, double dimes, and half dimes, it provides—

That there shall be two gold coins, one containing 246.268 grains of fine gold equal to $10, and to be called an eagle. One containing 123.134 grains of fine gold equal to $5, and to be called a half eagle.

HAMILTON'S REPORT.

To this point had the evolution of our "money unit" arrived when Hamilton entered the debate with his celebrated report on the establishment of a mint. This was presented to Congress in April, 1791, and as the views therein expressed were subsequently embodied in the coinage act of 1792, he may be said to have given the subject its final form and finish and his views to have received the honor of acceptance by the American people. Mr. Hamilton, in this report, covers the entire ground of the previous discussion, and treats the subject with a firmness of grasp and clearness of insight into the principles of monetary science only possible to his amplitude of understanding and intellectual penetration. The first inquiry to which he addresses himself is, "What ought to be the nature of the money unit of the United States?" By way of preliminary he alludes to the then existing "unit" in the money of account, which he maintained was the "pound sterling," though it could not be said to be the "unit in the coins." In the absence of legislation, usage and practice, he thought, had given that character to the Spanish milled dollar. He, however, saw objections to the "dollar," because it had never had any settled or standard value according to weight or fineness, while gold, on the other hand, had a fixed price by weight and fineness. He says:

The greater stability of value of the gold coins is an argument of force for regarding the money unit as having been hitherto virtually attached to gold rather than to silver.

Then, again, he suggested that the variety of "dollars" then current, containing unequal amounts of fine silver, presented a difficulty in defining the particular "dollar" to which the "money unit" was to be applied, supposing it to be most applicable to that species of coin. Nor did he omit to point out the importance of applying the unit to a coin that would be comformable to the existing proportion between the two metals in this country as well as to that which obtains in the commercial world generally.

NO PREFERENCE FOR EITHER METAL.

He next applies his mind to the inquiry whether or not the money unit ought to be peculiarly attached to either of the metals in preference to the other, and if to either, to which of them. The argument in this part of the report advances with so firm and sure a foot that I must, at the risk of tediousness, reproduce a portion of it in Mr. Hamilton's own words.

After indicating that the resolutions of Congress of 1785 and 1786, declaring the money unit to be a dollar, and providing for both gold and silver coins, were not clear in their meaning, since they did not explain whether either of the two species of coins of gold or silver had any greater legality in payments than the other, and suggesting that a preference in the matter of payment was necessary to carry out the idea of attaching the unit exclusively to one metal, he says:

If each of them be as valid as the other in payments to any amount, it is not obvious in what effectual sense either of them can be deemed the money unit rather than the other. If the general declaration that the dollar shall be the money unit of the United States could be understood to give it a superior legality in payments, the institution of coins of gold and the declaration that each of them shall be equal to a certain number of dollars would appear to destroy that inference. And the circumstance of making the dollar the unit in the money of account seems to be rather a matter of form than of substance.

Contrary to the ideas which have heretofore prevailed in the suggestions concerning a coinage for the United States, though not without much hesitation, arising from a deference for those ideas, the Secretary is, upon the whole, strongly inclined to the opinion that a preference ought to be given to neither of the metals for the money unit. Perhaps if either were to be preferred it ought to be gold rather than silver.

But upon the whole it seems to be most advisable, as has been observed, not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this can not be done effectually without destroying the office and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise, which, accordingly, at different times, has been proposed from different and very respectable quarters, but which would probably be a greater evil than occasional variations in the unit from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals, especially if care be taken to regulate the proportion between them, with an eye to their average commercial value.

Later on in this report Mr. Hamilton recurs to the question of the "money unit," and concludes the discussion as follows:

The conclusion to be drawn from the observations which have been made on the subject is this: That the unit in the coins of the United States ought to correspond with 24¾ grains of pure gold and with 371¼ grains of pure silver, each answering to a dollar in the money of account. The former is exactly agreeable to the present value of gold, and the latter is within a small fraction of the mean of the two last emissions of dollars, the only ones which are now found in common circulation and of which the newest is in the greatest abundance. The alloy in each case to be one-twelfth of the total weight, which will make the unit 27 grains of standard gold and 405 grains of standard silver.

Each of these, it has been remarked, will answer to a dollar in the money of account. It is conceived that nothing better can be done in relation to this than to pursue the track marked out by the resolution of the 8th of August, 1786. This has been approved abroad as well as at home, and it is certain that nothing can be more simple or convenient than the decimal subdivisions. There is every reason to expect that the method will speedily grow into general use when it shall be seconded by corresponding coins. On this plan the unit in the money of account will continue to be, as established by that resolution, a dollar and its multiples, dimes, cents, and mills, or tenths, hundredths, and thousandths.

HOW HAMILTON DETERMINED THE WEIGHT OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

It is worth noting in this connection how Hamilton determined upon 371¼ grains of fine silver as the most suitable amount for the silver dollar. He found that the Spanish milled dollars of different dates varied in the amount of silver they contained, one containing 374 and another 368 grains, and that neither one sustained to 24¾ grains of fine gold the ratio of 15 to 1, which coincided with the difference in the coined metals as established by custom in our market and in our currency. Taking the mean of the two Spanish pieces, however, he found that the proportion conformed very nearly to the ratio of 15 to 1, so that he had only to multiply 23¾ by 15 to obtain 371¼ as the proper weight in grains for the silver dollar.

He then gives the following schedule of coins which he thinks would be advisable until experience demonstrates the necessity for others:

One gold piece, equal in weight and value to ten units or dollars.
One gold piece, equal to a tenth part of the former, and which shall be a unit or dollar.
One silver piece, which shall also be a unit or dollar.
One silver piece, which shall be in weight and value a tenth part of the silver unit or dollar.

One copper piece, which shall be of the value of a hundredth part of a dollar. One other copper piece, which shall be half the value of the former.

He then says in conclusion:

It is not proposed that the lightest of the two gold coins should be numerous, as in large payments the larger the pieces the shorter the process of counting, the less risk of mistake, and consequently the greater the safety and the convenience; and in small payments it is not perceived that any inconvenience can accrue from an entire dependence on the silver and copper coins. The chief inducement to the establishment of the small gold piece is to have a sensible object in that metal, as well as in silver, to express the unit. The smallest of the two gold coins may be called the dollar or unit in common with the silver piece with which it coincides.

HAMILTON'S CONCLUSIONS.

Having in view the previous summing up of Morris's and Jefferson's views, the conclusions of Hamilton may now be placed for comparison beside those of his distinguished cotemporaries, as follows:

1. That up to that time the money unit had practically been attached to both gold and silver.
2. That coin should be struck in both metals to correspond with the money unit.
3. That the money unit should be based on both metals.

THE COINAGE ACT OF 1792.

It is suitable at this point to bring into view the section of the coinage act of 1792, which relates to the money unit, that it may be seen whether on a fair construction it expresses the Hamiltonian and the Jeffersonian view or the contrary one.

The ninth section reads in part as follows:

That there shall be from time to time struck and coined at the said mint coins of gold, silver, and copper of the following denominations, values, and descriptions, viz: Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units, and to contain 247½ grains of pure or 270 grains of standard gold; half eagles, each to be of the value of five dollars, and to contain 123¾ grains of pure or 135 grains of standard gold; quarter eagles, each to be of the value of two dollars and a half dollar, and to contain 61¼ grains of pure or 67½ grains of standard gold; dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain 371¼ grains of pure or 416 grains of standard silver.

SOME REFLECTIONS.

Having before us the foregoing review of the facts of the situation, the reasonings of the fathers of 1792 and the enactment which embodies their conclusions, we are in a position, each according to his own light and leading to subject, to suitable tests the validity of the views which have been from time to time advanced on the subject.

It will be seen that the act of 1792 is not as explicit in defining a "money unit" as the act of 1873, nevertheless the meaning which the language carries is free from doubt. The Spanish milled dollar was at that time a current coin. Its value was known, and that value was to be the "money unit," by the terms of which all values in commerce were to be expressed and in correspondence with which coins were to be struck. Some find a stumbling block in the fact that a coin of silver was struck and no corresponding one of gold identical in value with the ideal unit and bearing its name. But that has no tendency to prove that the "unit" was based upon that metal in preference to gold. Indeed, the contrary may be conclusively presumed from the absence of an express declaration to that effect. It will be remembered that Robert Morris, as already stated, proposed no coin corresponding with his money unit, while Hamilton thought it better to have such a coin in both metals. In many countries there are no coins struck corresponding with the unit of value. It is well known that in Great Britain the pound sterling is the unit of value, but no coin answering to that unit was ever struck. In France and the other countries of the Latin Union the "money unit" is the franc, yet no such piece of full legal-tender money was ever struck. Our existing money unit is indisputably a gold dollar, but we coin no answering piece of money. In Spain the unit of value is the silver peseta, equal to a franc, but it is not a full legal-tender coin. In Germany, where the gold standard prevails, the unit of value is the mark, but no gold coin answering to it was ever struck.

So the most superficial knowledge of the subject makes it obvious that the denomination of coins struck at the mint affords little aid in construing the act of 1792 as to whether the money unit was based on one or both metals, for it has no more logical connection with the unit than another question mooted at the time, namely, whether the coins should contain representations of English barbarities or selections from the proverbs of Solomon and the wisdom of Franklin?

HAMILTON'S REASONING.

No one can follow the reasoning of Mr. Hamilton without being sensible of its clearness and convincing power. It may easily be that were he arguing the question now he would put less stress upon the equality of legal-tender power in the two metals as evidence of an intention to attach the money unit to both of them. But the argument carried great force and cogency in the then state of monetary knowledge and experience. It was doubtless taken for granted by Hamilton, for Adam Smith had declared it only fifteen years before, that in all countries only the measure of value money was legal tender. That Jefferson was in substantial unity with his reasoning and his conclusions, adds distinctly to the credit of both. No two voices in all the land were more potential than theirs, and when united, as they were on the "double basis" of our money unit, it is hardly permissible to believe that their counsel was disregarded by Congress in legislating upon the subject.

CONCLUSION.

And therefore, at whatever conclusion others may arrive from an equally sincere consideration of the same data, I am of opinion that the reasoning of the fathers, the earliest consideration given the subject by Congress, the terms of the coinage act of 1792, their logical and grammatical construction, and the antecedent probability that the conclusions of Hamilton and Jefferson were intended to be embodied in the law, all unite to constitute an impregnable body of evidence in support of the view that the act was intended to attach the money unit to gold and silver alike. That 24¾ grains of fine gold and 371¼ grains of fine silver, coined or uncoined, each equal in value to the Spanish milled dollar, constituted our money unit, to be known by the denomination of "dollar" or "unit" (the words being used interchangeably), in the terms of which all values were thereafter to be expressed; that the given weight of one metal and the given weight of the other were alike the sensible objects answering the ideal unit; were equal in value, equal in legal-tender power, and possessed an equally incontestable title to the honor of being the basis of our money unit under the bimetallic system which the genius of Hamilton, the philosophy of Jefferson, and the wise statesmanship of their contemporaries established more than a hundred years ago.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat amazed that so many complications are found or rather imagined in this very simple bill. The bill asks an answer of "yes" or "no" to two single questions. We are asked whether, in case of temporary deficiency, the Government shall be authorized to issue temporary loan certificates at low rates of interest. What American can answer anything but "yes" to that question? How that deficiency arose is not before us. We meet a condition and not a theory. The remedy is proposed by this bill, and we must grant it. So much for the second section of the bill.

The first section is equally simple. It does not authorize the issue of bonds; that was commanded by the resumption act of 1875. It does not change the legislation of 1878, as to the reissue of greenbacks. It says simply that when bonds are issued the interest shall be low, and that the subscriptions shall be open to the public. As I have said, this is but a single question. Low interest and popular subscription must go together. The people do not understand subscribing $120 in order to get back $100 in twenty or thirty years. Our people are ready to lend their money to the Government, I believe, at as low a rate as 2 per cent, but they wish what they lend to be paid back at the end of the term.

Now, there are two single questions to be answered, "yes" or "no." What need of amendment? Amendments would only bring in subjects on which we differ—subjects that have been argued on this floor and that we shall hereafter deal with but that are not within this bill. Amendments would only confuse the direct, the simple, the earnest, the immediate purpose of this bill—patriotic as well as simple—to give relief to the Government and people of these United States. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the essential spirit of the pending bill is a stern arraignment and severe rebuke of Grover Cleveland and the Democratic Administration for the last two and a half years. It is a condemnation of secret loans by unfriendly lenders from abroad, procured through the agency of usurious syndicates at home. It demands a halt here and provides that the loans in the future shall be domestic ones, available to the citizens of our own country. It will advertise to foreign nations for all time that this country can procure at home all the money it requires. This will be a salutary lesson, calculated to inspire the nations of the world with respect for our resources and powers.

The notion in the minds of some that this bill can be used by an unfriendly Administration to retire the greenbacks is a grossly mistaken one. The bill before us not only recites the act of 1878, which makes the reissue mandatory, but freshly declares that the act of 1878 shall be in full force and virtue. Indeed, legally and in terms, the pending bill makes the act of 1878 an operative and vital part. No Republican should refuse his assent to this bill. It domesticates our loans, reduces their cost, rebukes a reckless and improvident Administration, and provides measures of safety should a discredited Administration, by a wasteful policy, require further money in the short time it is destined to be inflicted upon our country. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill, because its provisions will not only burden an already debt-ridden people, but will legalize a long series of usurpations by different Secretaries of the Treasury. The caption declares this a bill "to protect the coin redemption fund," while at the same time there is not a single line of law upon the statute book authorizing or providing any such fund. Judging from past experience, without doubt this language would be construed by the Secretary for the purpose of sequestering in the Treasury this vast sum of $100,000,000, which should be in the channels of business, giving life and vigor to our commercial transactions. This unauthorized fund has been maintained in absolute idleness for over twenty years, and at simple interest has cost the people more than $80,000,000. This is a covert attempt to legalize an unwarranted assumption, which alone should prevent the passage of the bill. Mr. Speaker, instead of this being a bill to protect the coin redemption fund, it is, more properly speaking, in my judgment, an act to provide for a deficiency in our revenues. The President has already issued over $160,000,000 of interest-bearing bonds for the alleged purpose of strengthening this reserve fund. In my opinion we might with profit inquire as to what has become of the proceeds of the sale of these bonds.

Mr. Speaker, is it not true that the one hundred and sixty millions of gold received from the sale of these bonds was drawn out of the Treasury through the redemption of United States notes or greenbacks? Is it not also true that these one hundred and sixty millions of United States notes or greenbacks have been paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury in the ordinary expenses of the Government? I repeat, has it not been the custom of the present Secretary to sell bonds for gold, to exchange the gold for United States notes, and then to use these notes in payment of our governmental expenses? Then why come here with a bill claiming to protect "the coin redemption fund," when in fact and in practice it is a bill to supply a deficiency in the revenue?

I believe in dealing with the people frankly and squarely, and if this bill is really to maintain a redemption fund, it should be so stated, plainly and distinctly, and then used for no other purpose whatever. If, on the other hand, as is now secretly practiced, it is to supply a deficiency in the revenue, I maintain that such a declaration should be made, in order that all may clearly understand its import.

Besides, I am decidedly in favor of curtailing rather than extending the discretionary powers of the Secretary of the Treasury in our financial affairs. The act of 1875, mentioned in this bill, provided for the sale of bonds at his discretion, at not less than par in coin, while the last issue of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury was made for so many ounces of gold bullion. I merely mention this to show the character of the usurpation of power by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Speaker, there is a vast difference between selling bonds for coin, which means both gold and silver, and bartering the obligations of the United States for gold bullion.

I assume that all of our present difficulties would be eliminated and further legislation upon this subject unnecessary if we had a Secretary of the Treasury who would obey the law now upon the statute book of the nation. There is to-day not a bond, coupon, obligation, or debt of any character against the United States which is not payable, principal and interest, in coin; and coin to-day means just what it has since the foundation of the Government—both gold and silver.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the vaults of the Treasury bursting with silver, with the great plain people struggling beneath a load of debt and distress, I assert that it is unfair, unjust, wholly uncalled for, that interest-bearing bonds, in time of peace, should be sold, to further impoverish our people, and through this interest levy tribute upon their hard toil, while there are lying idle in the Treasury one hundred and fifty millions of silver. [Applause.] Let the Secretary of the Treasury obey the law. Let him treat alike all obligations of the Government. Let him consider the debt of the humblest American laborer in the same light that he does the debt due the alien money lender. All are payable in coin, and all should alike be paid in coin.

If it could be announced to-morrow that an American policy of finance would be inaugurated and the further domination of alien money lenders resisted, the same enthusiasm and patriotic response would come from the people to the support of the Administration that was witnessed when the President so forcibly reaffirmed the Monroe doctrine, and notified England to encroach no farther upon American soil. A similar announcement on the financial situation would infuse new life into the Democratic party, from which hope has been crushed by the financial policy of the present Administration.

Let the United States, like France, begin the payment of silver for her paper money when presented for redemption, and the necessity for another bond issue would vanish. Let us also imitate the example of France in refusing to furnish gold for export. In doing this we would simply be putting into practice that grand rule of humane government, "equal rights to all, special privileges to none."

There is another point, Mr. Speaker, that seems to have been overlooked. It is claimed by the Secretary in his last report that there is in circulation among the people four hundred and seventy-five millions in gold coin. From the report of the Comptroller of the Currency it is learned that not over one hundred and fifty millions is held by the banks, leaving three hundred and twenty-five millions among the people. If the Secretary of the Treasury would expend as much energy in exchanging with the people greenbacks for this gold that he does in exchanging gold for greenbacks with alien financiers, I am of the opinion that the exigencies of the Treasury might be relieved without a further issue of bonds.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] advanced the proposition to secure this gold by an issue of interest-bearing certificates of indebtedness. In my judgment the object might be attained at far less expense by exchanging greenbacks which come into the Treasury for this gold coin among the people.

In order to meet the temporary deficiency in the Treasury, instead of interest-bearing obligations to become a burden upon the people, I would suggest certificates be issued against every idle ounce of silver in the Treasury. This would give instantaneous relief and would put into circulation among the people, without the burden of interest, a kind of currency that none would refuse and all be glad to get. These, in brief, are my objections to the bill. I believe they are valid.

I can see no good reason why the taxpayers, the producers and toilers of this country, should be forced to pay an interest tribute extending to generations yet unborn when the simple application of justice and common sense would obviate the necessity of it all. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I crave the attention of the House for ten minutes—not much time in which to talk about a matter of this importance.

The resumption act, passed in 1875 in a time of peace, was and is a Republican act. It authorized, I say to the gentleman from California, the issuing of bonds to establish and maintain resumption. Secretary Sherman issued $95,000,000 of bonds in 1878, and with the proceeds, $100,000,000 of gold, resumed specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879. And from that time up to President Cleveland's second term there never was another dollar of those bonds issued or a necessity for their issue. The resumption fund remained intact.

Bear with me, Republicans and Democrats, while I speak of one other record that was made under wise administration and wise legislation. When that resumption act passed the Government of the United States was paying 6 per cent interest. From the time of resumption in 1879 until June 30, 1892—thirteen years—there never was for one day or one moment a deficiency of revenues to meet the current expenses. Aye, more; we met all those expenses, and paid besides $1,200,000,000 of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, nearly a hundred millions a year; and the annual interest charge of eighty-three and one-half millions per annum in 1879 dwindled to $23,000,000 and less in 1892. And, Mr. Speaker, under Republican economic policies, with the ever-present power to issue bonds, if necessary, in the Secretary of the Treasury, these great revenues have been gathered and our country was a perfect hive of industry from one end to the other, and prosperity existed for the entire thirteen years, such as the world has never known. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But some gentlemen now say, "We will not now give the Secretary any additional power to borrow money at a lower rate of interest," and the last gentleman who addressed the House, who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MCLAURIN], says he would take from him the power he now possesses. Mr. Speaker, you can not give the Secretary too much power to borrow at the smallest interest, provided he wisely exercises it. I recollect when you Democrats proclaimed, in 1878, that you would give $100,000,000 to head the column that would break the Treasury. Mr. Sherman put $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury for resumption, and back of that was the power to pledge the credit of the Government, that, thank God, had credit then for any amount. [Applause on the Republican side.] We were not called upon to redeem. But what is the matter now? In 1892 you elected your President on a platform that pledged you to break down the industries of the country, and your power spread like a pall over the body politic, and from the day of Grover Cleveland's election in November, 1892, to this time, deficiencies, distress, idleness, poverty, panic have attended your footsteps. [Applause on the Republican side.] With full power to construct, you did not construct. Instead of paying off a hundred millions of the debt every year, you have borrowed $180,000,000; and what for? In the name of "resumption" you borrow and use the funds to make up a deficiency that your revenue measures have produced! [Applause on the Republican side.] Now where are we? The President sends us a message saying that the gold is disappearing from the Treasury. Yes, Mr. President, and a deficiency remains, and increases at the same time. But what are you Democrats doing? Why, you criticise, but offer nothing. You did not offer anything in the last Congress. Even when we proposed to give you something, you said "No." Now a Republican House—and, gentlemen, that is all that is Republican in this Government to-day—the Republican House of Representatives refused to adjourn over the holidays, and said, "We are chosen the doctors; we will give a remedy, so far as the House can give a remedy, that will reach the root of the disease." [Applause on the Republican side.]

What was the first thing to be done? It was to pass a bill which would make the revenues of this Government sufficient to meet the expenditures of this Government, and carrying with it incidental protection. And relief under that bill, if enacted, so far as deficiency and resumption are concerned, will come as surely as the water came when the rock was struck by Moses in the desert. But what have you gentlemen done on the other side? You have struck, fought against, criticised—God Almighty never made a set of men who could better tear down and criticise—while you are without an atom of power to build up, preserve, or increase. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] We passed our bill, and passed it at once. We knew that the President was not in good faith, yet we wanted to do what we could, whether he was in good faith or bad faith, to give the proper relief that we knew was required. We applied the remedy that was necessary. We acted, and acted promptly. Yet you Democrats complain of our speed. Why, my God! one of you gentlemen would have been talking on that side for a week if we had given you an opportunity. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, this bill is pending. What is there to do? Gold going out; deficiency increasing. We come with this bill and say we have here the condition brought about by Cleveland and Democracy. There can be no return of prosperity until in the White House, until in the Senate, and in this House, the Republican party is in the ascendency to write on the statute books our policy. [Applause on the Republican side.] When that condition comes, as come it will, Mr. Speaker, we will establish that policy which will bring relief and prosperity to the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] At present we can only do the best we can under existing circumstances.

In the meantime we will take no proper power from the Secretary of the Treasury. He ought to have all the power that is necessary, and if he abuses it a just public sentiment will hold him responsible. We will authorize, in addition to the 4 and 5 per cent bonds, which he can now issue, a 3 per cent, short-time, popular bond. We will make him offer these bonds—the fours, the fives, and the threes—to the American people first. We say by this act, if enacted into law, Mr. Grover Cleveland, you shall not in the secret hours of the night, without the knowledge of the people of the United States, assemble a syndicate of men and place the obligations of our Government, our public securities, in their hands at a profit to the syndicate of ten to twenty millions of dollars. We say our people, in our opinion, stand ready and able to give the relief, and should have the first opportunity.

Mr. BOWERS. Does not it look as if he were going to get the start of us?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, gentlemen, what are we Republicans doing? We are proposing a measure of relief. What are you Democrats doing? You say, "No." Let me tell you how it looks to me: That already, before the last Cleveland message was sent to Congress, an agreement was made by him with the syndicate for another issue of bonds at a rate far below their value. Look here, my Democratic friends, you voted solidly against this proposition last winter when you could have had it, and you will vote solidly against it now. You free silver coinage Democrats, 16 to 1, are against it because you want to impair the value of the currency. You cuckoo Democrats are against it because the President has sent down his order for you to be against it. But as an evidence of Republican wisdom and patriotism, in my judgment, on this side of the House we stand ready to pass it. If the Senate passes it and the President signs it, it is well. If the Senate and President object we at least cast our mite, so far as we can, toward reassuring the people of the United States that we will protect the public credit and prevent improper contracts with syndicates. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this bill, for reasons different from many of the reasons which will be advocated by members of the Democratic party. I am opposed to the passage of this bill because I believe that its passage, instead of strengthening confidence in the financial ability and integrity of the Government, will shake public confidence and lead to panic or to financial depression. If I believed this were an honest measure of relief I should cast my vote in its favor, but I am opposed to it because it is not a gold measure, because the bond provided for is not a gold bond. I know that it is somewhat unpopular in this House for a member to avow that he is a monometallist, but I have been, and am to-day, and always shall be—until that vague, impossible international agreement which is hinted at shall be consummated—in favor of a single gold standard; that is, in favor of a standard invariable in nature, approaching most nearly the ideal of immutability or unchangeableness; and you will all agree with me that the precious metal, which has been dominant in the world as the standard of value for centuries past, is the only safe single standard.

But passing by that question, I may in the limited time accorded to me be enabled only to indicate the objections to this special measure. The views which I express on monometallism are my own views, but I think it is safe for me to assert that the sound-money Democrats are opposed to this bill for substantially the same reasons which I shall adduce.

The Republican party will bear the responsibility for the character of relief now offered to the country. The failure of this measure of relief—so called, but in reality no measure of relief—will not lie upon the shoulders of the Democratic party. The gentlemen upon that side, the Republican side of the House, will be responsible for the further depletion of the gold reserve and for the failure to maintain public confidence in the integrity of our financial system. In the first bill, the tariff bill, which was offered the other day, if you intended to give us relief, why did you not bring in a measure based on revenue lines only? Why did you not offer us a bill imposing duties on the great revenue-producing articles, such as tea and coffee, and imposing a stamp duty? Why did you offer us a bill protective in its nature and a bill which it would be impossible for any Democratic Executive ever to affix his signature to?

What are the objections to this measure? In the first place, you avoid the issue. The gold reserve fund was never created by positive law, and it is mentioned for the first time in the act of 1882 in the following words:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000.

Why do you not call this a gold bullion and gold coin redemption fund in the title of your bill? Because you dare not take that issue; because you know that the members of your party on that side of the House will not pass a bill providing for a bond payable specifically in gold. You deny the Secretary of the Treasury the only relief he asks for.

The second section of this bill is comparatively unobjectionable, because that provides for certificates of indebtedness running a short time, in lieu of the short-time bonds asked by the Secretary, and the only objection to that section is that the amount is limited to $50,000,000. But the salient measure of relief demanded by the Secretary of the Treasury is that you issue what? Bonds payable in the first place in gold. In the second place, that those bonds be long-time bonds. What do you give him? You give him a coin bond, a bond which can not be floated. You give him a bond running for five years, then redeemable at the pleasure of the United States in coin, and at most payable in fifteen years. Then you deny him the great measure of relief which is imperatively demanded by the interests of this country. What is that? That the greenbacks shall be gradually retired and canceled. Why, a measure of this kind is absolutely futile. You are probably aware that it will not pass even in this House. It certainly can never receive the signature of a Democratic Executive. Now, what is to be done? What is the country entitled to? If the revenue is not to be increased on revenue lines, what other measure of relief should be granted? In the first place, a gold bullion and a gold coin redemption fund should be created expressly by statute. In the second place, that fund should be made to consist of either $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, and should be sacredly set aside for the redemption and eventual cancellation and retirement of the legal-tender notes. And then the provision of the act of May 31, 1878, requiring the reissue of the redeemed greenbacks should be repealed.

A further objection to this bill is found in the provision as to advertising. Of the first loan that was issued, of $50,000,000, only some $745,000 were taken by individuals. Of the second loan of $50,000,000 only $1,533,000 were taken by individuals, and these large loans must be taken in the main by institutions and by banks, and the advertising is futile, unnecessary, and undesirable from every commercial and financial standpoint.

The specific demand of the Secretary of the Treasury is contained in these words: That he shall have authority to issue from time to time bonds, payable in gold, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, and having a long time to run, and to exchange the bonds for United States notes and Treasury notes upon such terms as may be most advantageous to the Government, or to sell them abroad for gold whenever in his judgment it is advisable to do so, and use the gold thus obtained in redeeming the outstanding notes.

So, if we were allowed to offer amendments, I should offer the following amendments:

I should alter the title so that it should read: "A bill to maintain and protect the gold coin and gold bullion redemption fund."

Gentlemen, you must remember that of the gold reserve fund now nearly one-half, or $31,000,000, consists of gold bullion, and the balance, some $35,000,000, consists of gold coin.

I should provide that authority should be given to issue, sell, and dispose of the bonds at not less than par in gold coin, inserting the word "gold;" and I should further provide that these bonds should be redeemable by the Treasury of the United States in gold coin, and should be payable in gold coin, and I should insert a section repealing the provision of the act of 1878 which requires the reissue of the redeemed greenbacks.

So that there could not be any doubt in the minds of the public as to our intention to preserve the integrity of our financial system.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate with much interest and some astonishment. Some gentlemen on that side oppose the passage of this bill because the bonds authorized are not made payable in gold. Others oppose it because it does not expressly provide that the bonds shall be payable in gold and silver instead of "coin." From these differences among the Democratic members of this House it would seem their party has lost that admirable quality of harmonious cohesion which it has always displayed when playing the rôle of a national "kicker," a rôle in which it has exhibited its greatest usefulness and won its chief renown.

On this side a few Republicans have expressed their disapproval of the measure for the reason that, as they claim, it is contrary to the policy of the Republican party, and further because the people are opposed to issuing bonds in times of peace, and that they fear the passage of the bill will authorize the retirement of greenbacks.

Before discussing these several propositions on which gentlemen are trying to justify their votes against the bill, and in order that we may know whether or not the Committee on Ways and Means acted wisely in reporting this bill to a Republican House as a means of tiding over the existing emergency, I desire to briefly call attention to a few facts that preceded the action of the committee.

On Friday of last week the financial condition of our Government became so alarming that the President deemed it necessary to address Congress on the subject, and in a special message he took occasion to ask that we take immediate steps to relieve a situation that threatened financial disaster and ruin to American interests. In that message, after referring to his last annual message, he describes the situation as follows:

> The contingency then feared has reached us, and the withdrawals of gold since the communication referred to, and others that appear inevitable, threaten such a depletion in our Government gold reserve as brings us face to face to the necessity of further action for its protection.

He then expressed the hope that the members of this House would forego the pleasure of spending the usual holiday recess at their homes, and by legislative enactment or declaration "do something not only to remind those apprehensive among our own people that the resources of their Government and a scrupulous regard for honest dealing afford a sure guarantee of unquestioned safety and soundness, but to reassure the world that, with these factors and the patriotism of our citizens, the ability and determination of our nation to meet, in any circumstance, every obligation it incurs, do not admit of question."

Appreciating the gravity of the situation, and in obedience to our sense of duty, and the wish of the people as expressed through the public press, this House complied with that part of the President's request by remaining in session. Almost immediately after that message was read at the Clerk's desk, one week ago to-day, the Committee on Ways and Means organized, and immediately addressed itself assiduously and in good faith to the remaining portion of his request by endeavoring to formulate such legislation as would meet the existing emergency and preserve our national credit.

Before deciding what could be done "to remind those apprehensive among our own people" of the financial soundness of their Government, and "reassure the world of the ability and determination of our nation to meet, in any circumstance, every obligation it incurs," it was necessary to ascertain the cause of our present unfortunate financial situation. With the Treasurer's report before us, showing that from July 1, 1893, to December 1, 1895, our Government expended almost $133,000,000 more than it received, and expended about $3,000,000 in the month of December in excess of its receipts, and that in addition to this enormous deficiency in revenue there was a deficiency in the gold reserve of about $40,000,000, making a total deficiency since July 1, 1893, of about $176,000,000, the majority of the committee soon reached the conclusion, long since arrived at by the people, that the primary cause of our difficulty was a deficiency in revenue, producing absolute insolvency. Thereupon the committee decided that the only adequate remedy was such legislation as would increase the revenue of the Government, making it equal to our expenditures. That bill passed this House Thursday of this week, and if it becomes a law will so increase the duties on imports as to net the Government in revenue $40,000,000 per year in excess of what we are to-day receiving.

To accomplish this on the line of the principles of the Republican party and in time to meet the existing emergency was out of the question for two reasons: First, because of the time and labor necessary to a just and equitable revision of our present tariff laws; and, second, that with a political mongrel at the other end of the Capitol, and a free-trade President at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue, no general revision of the tariff on the line of protection is possible. Under these circumstances it was thought the Republicans in this House would, for the time being, waive the principle of protection in the hope that thereby temporary legislation might be secured, notwithstanding the conflicting political views of the legislative and executive branches of our Government, that would at least enable the Government to save itself from absolute bankruptcy until 1897, when we all hope to see our Government again under the complete control of the Republican party, a party that has given to the American people a higher degree of prosperity and a more general diffusion of the comforts of life than any political organization that has ever controlled their affairs. [Applause.]

The bill which was presented by the committee for that purpose, and which has passed this House, was not drawn with any intention of embodying in it the principle of protection, nor could we hope in the time allowed to attempt to correct what Mr. Cleveland designated as the "outrageous discriminations" of the present law. To have done so would have involved so much time and created so much contention between conflicting interests that, metaphorically speaking, Rome would have burned while we were fiddling. I sincerely regret, Mr. Speaker, that one of the principal discriminations in our present tariff law could not have been corrected. I refer now to the injustice done to the farmers of our country in the framing and passage of that law. These great producers have suffered materially in consequence of that discrimination. There is abundant evidence in that section of the country which I have the honor to represent to show the hardships imposed upon those men whose chief products are barley, dairy products, and live animals, and I hope before the bill becomes a law, if it ever does, that it may be so amended that these several items may be relieved from the unjust discriminations to which they are subjected by the Wilson-Gorman tariff law.

In explanation of why these inequalities could not be removed in respect to the agricultural schedule, permit me to say that had a different course been pursued in respect to that schedule from that followed in respect to other schedules, it would have subjected the bill to the criticism of discriminating in favor of one interest as against other interests equally entitled to our favorable consideration, and thereby seriously jeopardized the speedy passage of the measure, a result more essential to the Government under the existing circumstances than the correction of the evils from which private individuals are now suffering in consequence of the inequalities and discriminations imposed by a Democratic Congress. To emphasize the fact that this was purely an emergency measure not intended by the Republicans of this House as the settled policy of their party, it was expressly provided that the bill, if it becomes a law, shall continue in force only until August, 1897, when it is to be hoped we may have on our statute books a tariff law framed in accordance with the principles and policy of our party. It is not alone, therefore, the incongruous political situation of the Government that makes it impossible at this time for the Republicans to legislate upon the line of protection to American industry and American labor, but also the fact that the exigency of our national Treasury is so urgent, and the delay incident to such action so inevitable, that our present dangerous financial condition would be aggravated rather than improved thereby.

But, Mr. Speaker, assuming that the emergency bill which has passed becomes a law, delay is certain before it will be effective as a revenue-producing law. In the meantime the daily statements from the Treasury Department will continue to show, as they have shown during the past two years, a deplorable condition of insolvency. Apprehension among the people will be quickly followed by universal alarm, resulting in financial distress and ruin. Under these circumstances our duty in the premises is plain. The gold redemption fund must be replenished and maintained. At present this can be done only by borrowing money. The daily deficiency in revenue must be supplied from some source other than existing laws.

No one pretends that our present unfortunate condition is permanent. All admit that it is only temporary, or, at most, can continue no longer than until the people have an opportunity to
